

SCHOOL OF ORIENTAL AND AFRICAN STUDIES UNIVERSITY OF LONDON

London Oriental Series Volume 14

LONDON ORIENTAL SERIES · VOLUME 14

JAINA YOGA

A SURVEY OF THE MEDIAEVAL ŚRĀVAKĀCĀRAS

BY

R. WILLIAMS

LONDON
OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
NEW YORK TORONTO
1963

Oxford University Press, Amen House, London E.C.4 Classow new york turning melbourne wellington Bombay califyth Maddar Sarachi Hadree Decla Capl town saliburny naironi hadna accea kilal lumpur hoko. Ron

(L) R Williams, 1963

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN

PREFACE

THE work here presented is an attempt to examine the contents of the principal Jains brāvakārāra. As these texts are not well known and often not easily accessible, some information about their authors has also been given and a few excerpts, designed to show the extent to which one writer depends on another, have been included in an appendix.

It will be noted that, to avoid confusion, all technical terms employed have been given in Sanskrit even in cases where an original Prakrit form has been falsely sanskritized.

A certain amount of repetition has been imposed by the plan of the work, and it can only be hoped that this has been kept to a minimum.

I should like to express my gratitude to Professor W. Schubring, who very kindly lent me his own copy of the Śrācaka-prajnapti, the basic Śvetāmbara text on śrāvahācāra, when he learned that I was unable to procure the work from any other source.

Finally I wish to acknowledge the generous assistance provided by the authorities of the School of Oriental and African Studies who have included this book in the London Oriental Series and met the full cost of its publication.

CONTENTS

Preface	v
Introduction	xi
Bibliography	xxvii
Authors—Śvetāmbara sampradāya	1
Authors—Digambara sampradāya	17
The Ratna-traya	32
Categories of śrāvakas	36
Categories of food	39
Samyaktva and mithyātva	41
The Mūla-gunas	50
The Vratas	55
The Ahimsā-vrata	64
The Satya-vrata	71
The Asteya-vrata	78
The Brahma-vrata	84
The Aparigraha-vrata	93
The Dig-vrata	99
The Bhogopabhoga-parimāṇa-vrata	102
Rătri-bhojana	107
The Abhakṣyas	110
The Ananta-kāyas	113
The Professions	117
The Apartha danda yesta	*20

viii	CONTENTS
The	Sāmāyıka-vrata

The Desāvakāśika-vrata The Posadhopavāsa-vrata

The Dāna-vrata The Sallekhanā-vrata

The Pratimas The Dina-carva

The Necessary Duties The Namaskāra The Cartya-vandana

The Vandanaka

Pratikramana and Alocana Pratyākhyāna

The Kayotsarga The Pūjā

The Aśātanās

Pramāda The Vatra

The Caitva

Vinaya and Vaiyavrttya

The Anuprekṣās

The Bhavanas

The Kalas

Svādhvāva Tapas Dhyāna

238 230 241

244

245

246

232 236

131

139

142

149

166

172

182

184

185

187

199

203

207

213

216

225

229

237

CONTENTS ıx The Seven Vyasanas 247 251 The Śrāvaka-guṇas 256 274

288

The Gatis

The Kriyas

Appendix

INTRODUCTION

WHEN Hemacandra gave to his treatise on the rules of conduct for laymen and ascetics the name of Yoga-äärra he intended to convey that it covered the whole relignous striving—what in Western terms might be rendered as a walking in righteousness all the days of one's life. Though he may have chosen this title in order to stimulate the interest of his royal patron, who appears to have been attached to yogic practices, it is normal Svetämbara usage to equate the term yoga with the rathat-raya, that combination of right belief, right knowledge, and right conduct on which the practice of Jainism is based. It is to a consideration of śrāwaka-dharma or śrāwakācara, the corpus of rules which have been elaborated to regulate the daily life of a layman, that this survey will be restricted.

The term srāvakācāra, current among the Digambaras but unknown, it would seem, to the Svetambaras, serves both as a general name for the topic and as a title for individual expositions designed to serve as breviaries for the householder and composed on parallel lines to the vaty-ācāras which explain the duties of monks. These treatises though to some extent they form a counterpart to the Hindu dharma-sastras do not embrace as wide a range of contents. For śrāvakācāra the Digambaras also employ the synonym upāsakādhvävana, which is their name for the lost anga corresponding to the Svetambara Upāsaka-dašāh. According to the Sat-khandāgama1 this dealt with the eleven pratimas, the conferment of the viratas, and the proper way of carrying them out. A later account2 of the lost aneas expands this enumeration and includes in the subjectmatter the pratimās, dāna, pūjā, sangha-sevā, vrata, guna, šīla, and krivā: in view of the ambivalence of some of these terms the delimitation remains imprecise. Śrāvaka, upāsaka, śramanopāsaka, grhin, sāgāra, deša-samyamin, deša-virata, śrāddha (this last a purely Svetambara usage) are amongst the names applied indifferently, at least in the mediaeval period, to the lay disciple whose partial or limited vows of good conduct form the subject of the trāvabācāras

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vol. 1, p. 102 <sup>2</sup> Anga-pra

The term mediaeval is purely one of convenience, for Jaina history may usefully be separated into three divisions. To the early period-the dark age covering the first millennium-belong the whole of the Svetāmbara canon and such fundamental Digambara works as the Prabhrtas of Kundakunda and the Tattvartha-sutra. The middle, or mediacyal, period extending from the fifth to the end of the thirteenth century is the most important historically and sees the preatest achievements in art and literature. Jaina groups and individuals in various parts of western and southern India are found exerting at times considerable influence on political developments, until the renaissance of Saivism (especially in the form of Vīraśaivism) in the south and the expansion of Islam in the north shatter the flourishing Jaina communities. The fourteenth century is the great divide. From then on Jainism is on the defensive, and its adherents having lost access to the sources of power are relegated to the role of a scattered minority, no longer proselytizing, and increasingly identified with certain narrow social groups. This modern period is therefore, by comparison with the past, an age of decadence.

The irrachazairas are not the only, nor indeed the hest, source of information on the lay life. Clearly their authors, who for the mediaeval period seem all, except Ašādhara, to have been monks, have not portrayed society as it existed but rather as they would have wished to see it, so that this survey may be said to be concerned in a sense with theory rather than with reality. Like the Hindu dharma-slitrata these treatises piesert a one-sided view but in them it is the idealized figure of the mini and not of the brahim that occupies the centre of the stage. The rich and varied kathā literature, however artificial and shackled by convention it may be, can add much to complete the picture whilst the epigraphical evidence remains still largely unexploited.

Though less voluminous than the treatises devoted to the monastic life the isrāvakācāras are still sufficiently numerous to make it difficult to cover their contents within a reasonable compass, even allowing for the fact that many have never been published or, even if printed, are not accessible in Europe. It was therefore decided to exclude all works in Tamil and Kanarsee and to limit the scope of this survey to writings in Sanskrit and Prakrit. The very extensive literature in Hindi and Gujarati belongs in any event to the modern period. If therefore the relatively small number of texts surveyed is taken into consideration the generalizations may seem at times too categoric and any conclusions reached are bound to rest on incomplete evidence.

This survey then is an attempt to describe the contents of the mediaeval śrāvakācāras including also the three aśvāsas from Somadeva's Yasastılaka which are often collectively referred to as an upasakadhvayana and the three parvans from linasena's Adipurana which describe the krivas or ceremonies marking the stages of progress in the lay and monastic life; in view of the esteem which they enjoy in the Digambara tradition it would have been impossible to omit these. On the other hand, with works such as the Dharma-bindu, Carstra-sara, Yoga-sastra, and Dharmamrta which treat of both the lay and the monastic life, only the sections relevant to the former have been taken into consideration. Nor are all the actual contents of the śrāvakācāras suitable for inclusion. The epitomes of the tattvas or padarthas, the basic dogmas of Jainism, prefixed by certain writers to their treatises offer, for example, no material that is not easily available elsewhere. The refutations of doctrines regarded as forms of muthyātva or false belief, though of intrinsic interest, are not germane to this survey: in general they are directed against the nastikas (with whom the Jamas are at great pains not to be confused), the Buddhists, or the Saivas, no attention being devoted to the Vaisnavas. Other excursions from the main theme are the heterogeneous items of information on topics as remote, for example, as stena-sastra which are to be found in the Svetambara commentaries and the technical instructions for the building of temples and fashioning of images.

It might be desirable in a study of this kind to concentrate on a fixed point in time and it may be objected that the period covered by the survey—eight centuries—is too long to permit of any cohesion of treatment. In fact three-quarters of the works considered belong to the eleventh and twelfth centuries. If any one book is to be taken as a standard it must be the Yoga-iāstra, the general plan of which has moreover been followed in deciding the sequence of the contents, which, following the Jaina pattern, have been arranged by numerical categories. No other religion has been so obsessed by the hallucination of numbers and any description which failed to take account of this unprepossessing presentation would not be faithful. For some aspects of Jaina practice in which there have been considerable inmovations such as the yārtā, where the mediaeval texts do not offer sufficient material, works subsequent to A.D. 1300 have been drawn on for supplementary information

Before discussing certain points which arise from the survey it would perhaps be desirable to note how far the subject of śrāvakācāra has attracted attention in the past. Weber touched on it in the course of his researches into the Jaina canon but the earliest attempt to produce an edition of a relevant text seems to have been made by Windisch when he published the first four prakasas of the Yopa-sastra: in the absence of the commentary his translation was naturally, at that stage, often speculative and sometimes wide of the mark. On the other hand, Hoernle's edition of the Upasakadaśāh included Abhavadeva's commentary and his renderings of text and commentary are still in the main valid. Jacobi's edition of the Tattnärtha-sütsa! made that fundamental work available with translation, but the section of it devoted to śrawakacara-the seventh adhyāva-us a small and relatively unimportant part of the whole. Ernst Leumann's researches into the Avasvaka literature were of relevance to the lay doctrine by the light which they threw on the Svetāmbara and Digambara liturgy. The two best general works on Jainism-Der Jainismus by H von Glasenapp and Die Lehre der Jainas by W. Schubring-are not concerned to a very great extent with the śrāvakācāra. The former dealt mainly with the contemporary scene, the latter covered the subject as far as it figures in the canonical literature with his usual masterly concision and impeccable scholarship

There was in Italy during the early years of this century a very great interest in Jaina and Middle Indian studies as the names of Tessitori, Pulle, Pavolini, Ballini, Bellom-Filippi, and Suali bear witness Suali in particular, in his edition of the *Dharma-binda* in the *Gornale Anataco, unhappily never continued beyond the fourth adhyāya, offered one of the most successful translations of a Sanskrit text into a European language, a version in which elegance and poetical felicity of style are matched by the author's mastery of his subject. With the text and translation are included an introduction and a commentary, based on that of Municandra, which together give a good idea of the classical Svetämbara *árkuokäära* doctrine. Belloin-Filippi, in the same periodical, embarked on an edition and translation of the Yoga-śāstra which did not progress very far.

H Jacobi, 'Eine Jaina Dogmatik', ZDMG lx (1906), pp. 287-325 and 512-55.

In India in the twentuse and thurties a group of Digambara propagandists headed by Jagmandarlal Jani and Champat Ray Jain produced in the Bibliotheca Januca editions of works such as the Ratna-haranda and the Puruṣārtha-siddhy-uṣpāya, coupling them with English translations of no high ment in which a modern interpretation often disfigures the sense of the original. The same objection applies to the pamphlets on the lay doctrine compiled by Champat Ray Jain and others. They belong rather with the voluminous ethical literature which issues so freely from the presses in Hindi and Guijarati.

Whilst in Svetāmbara circles no great attention seems to have been devoted to the study of the older sravakacara treatises there is a small body of work done by scholars, all Digambaras, that cannot be ignored. In particular from Nathuram Premi, Jugalkiśor Mukhtär, and Hiraläl Jain have come a number of contributions of significance written in Hindi and for the most part scattered over periodicals or incorporated in introductions to texts. Premi's essays, mainly drawn from the Jama Hitaishi, have been reprinted in book form under the title Jaina sahitya aur itihas and provide a mine of information, always cautious, always accurate, on a multiplicity of Jama and mainly Digambara themes including that of the layman's duties. Hīralāl Jain has prefaced his edition of the Vasunandi-śrāvakācāra by an introduction which is, in effect, the first monograph on śrāvakācāra in any language though limited to Digambara sources. Jugalkiśor Mukhtar, who in an early publication. Grantha pariksā, had discussed the spurious śrāvakācāras current in Digambara milieux, has more recently assembled in the introduction to the Purātana Jama-vākya-sūci much information on the chronology of Jama writers. A. N. Upadhye, who writes in English, has lately dealt with the subject in the admirable introduction to his edition of the Dvadasanupreksa. Another very recent work is the translation of the Sarvārtha-siddhi commentary by S. A. Jain, who has made a remarkably successful rendering of a difficult subject. A sociological study, the Jaina Community of V. Sangaye, contains much of interest on the śrangkacara: its value would have been higher had the author gone to the original sources instead of relying on such unsure guides as Mrs. Stevenson.

Though Hindi or Gujarati or, in a few cases, English translations exist for a number of the works which form the subject of this survey, only three of these are of sufficient quality to be utilizable without reference to the text. These are 'Suali's version of the Dharma-bindu, S. A. Jam's version of the Sarvartha-viddin, and the admirable Yaiastukaa and Indian Culture of K. K. Handiqui; this last might well serve as a prototype for similar studies of other classical works. It is not a translation, but all passages of significance in the original are so accurately rendered and clearly commented that recourse to the text can be avoided.

The traditional distinction between the code of behaviour for the householder, the śrāvakācāra, and that for the monk, the yatyācāra, is a fundamental one. Initially the lay estate was admitted by the Jina only in deference to human frailty and was regarded in theory as a stage of preparation for the ascetic life. In the early period of Jainism the śrāvakācāra was therefore of minimal importance, and as it has grown progressively in significance various expedients have had to be adopted to make up for the silence of the canonical texts. The corpus of the lay doctrine is in fact a creation of the mediaeval period. The Upāsaka-daśāh supplied the framework of the vratas, each with its five typical aticaras or infractions, and the pratimās. Though the notion that these aticāras were intended only as examples1 is familiar to the older Svetämbara ācārvas, they soon became, in practice, the basis of a complete moral code. The Avasvaka literature gave the details of the necessary duties which are obligatory on the layman as well as on the monk, and, doubtless because some practices belong at the same time to several categories-the sāmāyika, which is both vrata, pratimā, and avasvaka, is a case in point-and because in some of them the ascetic is assimilated temporarily to the position of a monk, the transference to the lay life of rules originally intended for the community of monks was facilitated. This process of adaptation was developed on a wide scale and contributed notably to the building up of the vast edifice of the temple ritual. An expanding tradition of sacred legends such as those which under the appellation of puranas have been fashioned by the Digambaras into the shape of a scripture helped to lend authority to innovations in practice as when the name of Kṛṣṇa Vāsudeva is invoked as the originator of the dvādašāvarta-vandanaka, A similar purpose was achieved by the conferment of a quasi-canonical authority on famous pūrvācārvas; an example is the use of the phrase iti Haribhadra-sūri-matam.2 The Digambaras, who by not admitting the authenticity of the extant canon have to some extent rejected the servitudes of tradition, have not hesitated before a conscious rationalization of the texts: this is true notably of the Tattvārthasūtra and the Ratna-karanda. Local usage or customary law. the desācāra, though accorded no mandatory force, has always been admitted as a guide wherever there is no conflict with Jama doctrine and more particularly in the modern period has been increasingly incorporated in the śrāvakācāra. An extreme instance of this process would be the sanctification of the arka-vivāha in the seventeenth-century Trawarnikācāra. At all times the building up of the śrāvakācāra has been assisted by the polyvalence of certain terms and by the habit, widespread among the commentators, of arbitrarily treating words or phrases as upalaksanas-symbols or examples of wider categories, and again and again the word adi is inserted by the commentators in places where the text offers no justification for it. The methods used in constructing the śrāvakācāra have their analogies elsewhere; it is with rather similar exiguous resources that the Christian and Moslem exegetes raised their elaborate edifices of morality.

<sup>1</sup> See, for example, Abhayadeva's remarks on UD i. 55.

In the presentation of the śrāvakācāra the original pattern, Digambara as well as Svetāmbara, seems to have been a description of samyaktva and the twelve vratas followed by a sketch of the ritual and incorporating miscellaneous injunctions that cannot be brought under the head of any particular yow. Hemacandra, drawing on ideas to be found in the Dharma-bindu, introduced the concept of the dina-carva as a device for describing the avasvakas and prefaced his discussion of the vratas by a delineation of the thirty-five śrāvaka-gunas. Both of these devices served as models for later śrāvakācāras: treatises like the Śrāddha-dina-krtva and Śrāddha-vidhi are based on a description of the day's ritual duties into which are inserted, under no very orderly arrangement, the moral precepts of the creed; whilst the more popular, discursive pattern of the śrāvaka-gunas, embodying the qualities of the ideal layman, is adopted in the Sraddha-guna-vivarana. The Digambaras have often chosen a framework in which the essential divisions are furnished by the pratimās, the wratas being treated under the second pratimā; or, less commonly, they have preferred a schema based on the categories of paksa (favourable inclination to the doctrine), msphā (performance of the pratimās), and sādhana (completion of one's life by ritual suicide). In general they have given only a perfunctory treatment of the āvasiyāhas, esteeming them to belong rather to the province of vativ-ācāra.

Perhaps because they disclaim the continuity of tradition the Digambaras seem to have felt more keenly than the Syetambaras the need to concretize and systematize the lay doctrine, and, in attempting a more logical presentation of the creed, they have effaced more than one discrepancy. It is basically this fact which has made it impossible to accept the same ascription for the Śrāvaka-prajñaptı and for the Tattvārtha-sūtra, which from the angle of śrāvakācāra is a wholly Digambara text. Ordinarily in any conflict of usage between the two sects, except in the practice of ascetic nudity, the Digambaras appear in the position of innovators. and it is precisely because they have largely jettisoned the deadwood of an earlier age that their testimony is of greater value for the conditions of the mediaeval period Fidelity to tradition has meant that while much valuable material lies embedded in the Syetambara commentaries the precise dating of any passage is very difficult since whole sections are handed on from one writer to another until, when all relevance to the contemporary scene has been lost, they are tacitly dropped, to risk being resurrected by some learned reformer like Yasovijava in a later age. From the religious angle a more serious handicap has been the oversubtilization of the exegesis of the vratas. Syadvada logic has been pressed into service to determine the exact nature of each bhanga and aticara but the niceties of calculation have weakened the compulsive force of moral commandments and ethical principles. For this reason probably, the Svetambaras in their later srangkararas abandoned the framework of the vratas.

Jana writers have shown a quite remarkable aptitude for the subtle handling of words evidenced by such achievements as the Jaina version of the Megha-dita. The polyvalence of certain expressions even within the limits of the same text is often disconcerting: gana in particular is greatly overworked and so are kriyā and karmal. Indeed one is led to wonder whether the double meanings given to many words and their formal identity with Hindu terms may not be voluntary. Examples of such coincidences (with the Jaina meanings noted in parenthesis) are: siva (mokka), higa (the monk's symbols such as the rajo-harana), guna-traya (the ratna-traya), pasispati (the funa), mahā-deva (the Jina) whils to nthe other hand the word Digambara itself can be an epithet of Siva. It may be that such resemblances were intended to render Jaina doctrines attractive to Sarvas or that a Saiva persecution made it desirable to give to certain Jaina texts an innocuous aspect. Certainly the Jainas's concept of astaya would make it easy for them to adopt an attitude similar to that of those Shiite sectarians who in the early days of Islam maintained an outward conformity by concealing their real beliefs under forms of words.

Two aspects of Jamism have been overstressed in most descriptions, the negative formulation of the creed and the absence of change in its history. In the last resort every moral code rests, like the Christian decalogue, on prohibitions; but even in Jamism each anuvrata has its positive as well as its negative aspect, ahimsa can be reformulated as dava, active compassion for all living beings, If Jamism has never challenged the constituted order of society, it has essayed to permeate it with the spirit of compassion but because human beings are actuated by self-interest it has pointed out to them the lower motives for doing good. Merit may be rewarded at any of three levels; by fortune in this life, by an auspicious reincarnation in the deva-loka or in a bhoga-bhumi, and by release from the cycle of existence. In popular Jamism where the second aim rates as high as the third it becomes as important to build up a good karma (which is not in harmony with the creed) as to destroy all karma.

The changelessness of Janism is no more than a myth. Admittedly there have been no spectacular changes in basic assumptions such as there were, for example, in Mahāyāna Buddhism. At most there have been variations in emphasis. Had Janism, as at one time must have seemed possible, become a majority religion in southern India something akin to a Digambara Mahāyāna might, with continuing favourable circumstances, have emerged. But all that can be detected today are the traces of aborted developments: thus in the Ratna-karanda the devadhideva is apostrophized as the annihilator of Kāmadeva who seems from the context cast for the role of the Buddhist Māra. But whilst the dooran remains strikingly firm the ritual changes and assumes an astonishing complexity and richness of symbolism. From implying merely the feeding of religious mendicants the duty of dāna comes to mean the provision of rich ecclesiastical endowments and, amongst the Svetāmbaras, the monk is no longer, except in theory, a homeless wanderer. It is recognized that he needs comfort, shelter, warmth to enable him to concentrate on study. The yādrā ceases to be a mere promenading of the idols through the city on a festival day and comes to denote an organized convoy going on pilgrimage to distant sacred places. And all the time more and more stress is being laid on the individual's duties to the community.

The Jana religion is a tirtha, a way of progress through life, and whilst the yay-ačar aceahes the individual how to organize his own salvation the aim of śrāvakācāra is to ensure that an environment is created in which the ascetic may be able to travel the road mokka. It must therefore be concerned with the community as well as with the individual and if the right people—the hhavyus—arc to be attracted to the right tirtha missionary efforts are necessary. Jainism welcomes the like-minded even if they do not outwardly profess its beliefs, and relies very much on the force of examples: a whole chapter of the Dharma-bindu is devoted to the need to cultivate those qualities in a person which are susceptible of encouraging respect for his beliefs in the community.

However, the essential change in Jainism during the mediaeval period is its transformation from a philosophy, a darsana, to a religion. All the new trends are in one sense or another movements towards a fuller way of life. One of the most important of these is that of which Jinasena is the chosen exponent. The krivas or ceremonies listed in the Adi-purana are the principal expression of a religion adapted to a ksatriva concept of society. Most striking is the prominence given to the upanavana or initiation rite which, like the monastic diksā, is described as a second birth. This and other imitations of Hinduism are decked with a certain external Jaina symbolism. However contrary the sanctification of marriage may be to the dictates of reason a religion that disdains such aid can with difficulty achieve a hold on the masses. An elaborate wedding ceremonial, again patterned on Hindu models, is therefore presented in the Adi-purana. Apart from this there is barely a mention of marriage in the śrāvakācāras except for a recapitulation of the eight forms recorded in the Hindu dharma-sāstras. Some of these, such as the gandharva-vivāha, are, as Āśādhara notes, directly contrary to the tenets of Jainism.

If this metamorphosis from a darsana to a religion is slowly taking place the rites continue to be no more than an elaborate apparatus of symbolism designed to enable the worshipper the better to concentrate on pious meditation. Jinasena admits the utility of a Jaina brahmin or ksullaka for the performance of certain krivās but no professional ministrants are needed to officiate in the temple. When even the garbha-grha, the inner sanctuary, conceals no sacred mystery each man has the right to remain his own priest. That role cannot belong to the monk who by his very vocation is restricted to the position of a passive witness. Certain avasvakas - bratikramana, alocana, pratyakhyana-are best performed before him but even there his presence is not essential for like the Jina. now for ever absent in the cuphory of his perfection but portrayed in the image, the monk too may be symbolically represented (by the sthanagarva). His one duty (if this term may be used) towards the layman is to instruct him in the sacred doctrine on which he remains the unchallengeable authority.

The polarity of householder and ascetic is indeed one of the most characteristic features of the Jaina structure. The layman has the obligation to cherish his family, the monk must sever all ties with them. The layman is enjoined to perform dravya-pūjā: not only does he offer fruits and flowers and sweetmeats but he cleans the image, and if he has skill in music and dancing (accomplishments which when put to any other use are regarded as undesirable and indeed harmful) he should display it; the monk on the other hand may offer only mental praise. Even if the tradition provides that as little water as possible should be used, the householder must still bathe frequently, but in theory at least the ascetic should never bathe. The monk—the Digambara monk—should be naked but the layman has to be decently clad, and for all religious ceremonies must wear at least two pieces of cloth. This antithesis of the partial and the complete vows disappears to some extent in some of the avasvaka rites where the layman is assimilated to the ascetic but in general it may be said that where the monk is excessive, since his life is the negation of compromise, moderation must be the keynote of existence for the householder whose life is rooted in compromise.

In his every action the householder is beset by the unintentional evil which he provokes in his daily work. As a deśa-virata, one whose gaze is only half averted from the sensual world, he must always be on his guard, apprehensive of sin. As the śrāvaka-gunas portray him he works hard, conforms to conventions, obeys constituted authority, leads a frugal and unostentatious life, and carefully calculates the consequences of every step he takes. This conception of the lay life which follows logically from the dogmas of the creed is assuredly the main factor responsible for the close association, so often noted, of Jainism with the middle-class trading community. Such a conclusion is very far from the view which, falsifying the picture of its origins, regards it as tailor-made for the bourgeoisie. Agriculture, India's basic occupation, has never been reckoned among the forbidden callings though various restrictions on its practice have been introduced on the basis of the ahimsatrata and commerce, medicine, astrology, and administration have all been recognized as licit. Some Digambaras like Imasena and Camundarava have even legislated for a ksatriva society. Not all Jamas are merchants but many merchants happen to be Jamas because the qualities highlighted in the ideal layman are also those which generally contribute to success in business, and so a creed of complete otherworldliness has offered a background for the successfully worldly.2

The differences which separate Jamsm from Hinduism and Buddhasm, the other two religions which India has given to the world, are largely differences of emphasis for all have built from common material. Ahmsā, for example, is preponderant in, but not peculiar to, Jamsm: it is extolled even in such Hindu texts as the Manu-smirt (which Hemacandra' stigmatuses as a hinnā-sāstra) but it is the central position and pervading character of ahmsā that separate the Jaina ethic sharply from Hinduism as well as from Islam and Christianty.

Resemblances to Christianity are of course no more than the fortuitous result of a common ascetic ideology, but the question may be raised whether Moslem influence may not at certain points during the mediacval period have touched Jaina practice. A clear answer is shaul to give but some developments which cannot be traced back to an early date have possibly been stimulated, if not

Such as that in effect taken by W. Ruben in Einfuhrung in die Indienkunde.
 A European parallel might be found in the history of the Quakers.

<sup>3</sup> YS 11 35

originated, by Islamic contacts. The wide extension of the category of the asatanas-the activities that are unfitting or indecent in a temple-if, on the one hand, it is evidence of an epoch when religious observance had grown weak, also reveals a notion of the sanctity of the physical edifice which is more evocative of Moslem barakah than of any traditional Jama attitude. Ratnasekhara's picture! of a pilgrim caravan making its way to Satruñiava bears less resemblance to any Hindu pilgrimage than to the hair, the example of which may have contributed to the spectacular development of what seems once to have been a mere variant of the vatra or religious festival Similarly, when Medhavin2 proclaims that the essence of James lies in the conviction that 'there is no deva but the Jina' it is difficult to believe that he was unacquainted with the Moslem profession of faith. But such likenesses are few and unimportant, and the only evidence for them comes from very late writers

The interaction of Buddhism and Janism dates from the very beginning of their history and lies largely outside the scope of this work though throughout the mediaeval period the two communities must have been in constant contact as the recurring references to Buddhism as the principal form of multiplica attest. It, however, might be noted that some Sanskrit Buddhist texts show curious similarities of terminology with the Jaina iritivakiatras in the discussion of the layman's dutter.

Hindu influences are at work throughout Jaina history though the Digambaras are significantly affected by them at an earlier date than the Svetāmbaras. The main line of hinduization runs through Jimasena, Cāmuṇdarāya, and Āsādhara. On the basis of the Hindu sangkāras an ambitrous fabric of Jaina krysā was et up and at the same time maintras intruded more and more into the continually enriched ritual, yogic techniques were adopted and, as the quotations from such works as the Māmu-imrh, the Vātṣyāyana-kāma-sirra, and the Āyurvedic texts show, Hindu śāstras gained wider currency. In the case of the Śvetāmbara community the opening up of new and wider horizons was largely the work of Hemacandra.

Earlier Jainism had relegated to the dešācāra all aspects of human activity not specifically covered by the traditional literature and had tacitly admitted non-Jaina practices provided that they were not in blatant conflict with its principles. Even the Kali-kaliarrajāa himself is content to say that where the religious law is silent the delacara should prevail. It is in fact only with the close of the mediaeval period that come the great inroads of Hinduist which completely reverse this attitude, and that elements contrary to the spirit of the religion are incorporated into the practice.<sup>4</sup> Above all, the characteristic of the latest phase of Janismis is that what was once regarded as optional comes to be expounded as obligatory.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 123b. <sup>2</sup> Śr (M) iv. 29.

It has already been noted that the early Jamism showed no concern with the rites de passage. Though an abundant literature is devoted to ritual suicide it is difficult to detect any reference to funeral customs or again to sūtaka before the fifteenth century. Marriage remained a question of regional usage at least until Jinasena prescribed a ceremony based on the Hindu fire ritual and the earliest Svetämbara work to deal in detail with this subject seems to have been the Acara-dmakara. But the immemorial usage of Hindu neighbours must at all times have coloured the individual Jama's life. Though only very late texts enjoin the use of cow's urine for purification, a chance statement, repeated by the commentators in explaining the brahma-vrata, attests the importance attached to it in ordinary custom. The general validity of the menstruation taboo is nowhere alluded to, but is attested by Devendra's casual reference to the story of a woman who brought on herself an evil reincarnation by making the Jina-pūjā whilst in a state of ritual impurity. Against the formal denial of attachment to loved ones the family reasserts its rights and the begetting of a son, recommended already by Aśadhara, becomes a duty in the late texts. Early Jainism knows no rules for eating, for bathing, for excretion save those which are designed to avoid destruction of life, and none at all for copulation, which theoretically should not take place, but the late śrāvakācāras take over from Hinduism minute instructions on these points. Pūjā, which initially has little importance because it does not affect the survival of the Jaina religion as such, comes to be given a greater significance than dana, which is essential since without it the monks could not live. Of all late accretions from Hinduism, however, the most striking is the introduction of sraddha or pitr-tarpana, condemned in the classical śrāvakācāras as a regrettable form of mithyātva.

<sup>1</sup> YŚ n 49 2 See Jugalkiśor Mukhtār, Grantha Parikjā, pp. 99-118.

Parallel with the phenomenon of hinduization goes that of sanskritization. Mähärästri Prakrit, though long a dead language. was, in the mediacval period, largely used by the Svetambaras with whom it had replaced another dead language, the Ardhamagadhi of the canon, both for ornate kāvyas in prose and verse and for scientific exposition. It is possible that its use was favoured by certain pacchas whilst others preferred Sanskrit but in any event, as treatises like Yasodeva's Pañcāsaka-cūrnī show. Haribhadra's innovation in writing commentaries on the sacred texts in Sanskrit was very far from dealing it a fatal blow. Hemacandra, however, though he wrote a grammar of Prakrit and himself composed a kāvva to illustrate its rules, virtually put an end to its use by spreading Sanskrit culture in Jama circles, and within a century of his death it had ceased to be adopted except for the composition of skeleton verses on which, as in the case of the Śrāddha-vidhi of Ratnaśekhara, a prose treatise could be draped. With the Digambaras the linguistic situation is less clear. Sanskrit had come into general use at an earlier date, but from time to time works were still written in Prakrit, perhaps again in particular milieux. As with the Svetambaras, however, the end of the mediaeval period seems to mark the final limit of its utilization.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. SANSKRIT AND PRAKRIT TEXTS USED IN THE PREPARATION OF THIS SURVEY!

Amıtsgəti Śrāvaklcāra (Anantakirti Digambara Jaina Granthamālā, no. 2). Bombay, 1922 — 'Subhāsira-atma-sandoha', edited with translation by R Schmidt in ZDMG lix. 61.	Śr (A)
Amrtacandra Puruşārtha-sıddhy-upāya (Rāyacandra Jaina Sāstramālā) Bombay, 1905.	PASU
Āśādhara Sāgāra-dharmāmṛta (Māṇikacandra Digambara Jaina Granthamālā, no. 2). Bombay, 1917 —— Anagāra-dharmāmṛta (Māṇikacandra Digambara	SDhA
Jama Granthamālā, no. 14). Bombay, 1919. Āvašyaka-sūtra with commentary of Haribhadra (Āgamodaya Samiti Siddhānta Samgraha, no. 1). Bombay, 1916	Åv (H)
Āvasyaka-sūtra with Cūrnī (Rsabhadeva Kesarīmala Jama Švetāmbara Saṃsthā) Ratlam, 1929.	Ãv Cũ
Camundarāya: Caritra-sāra (Māṇikacandra Digambara Jaina Granthamālā, no 9). Bombay, 1917. Cāritrasundara: Ācāropadeśa Ahmedabad, 1925.	CS ĀU
Devagupta Nava-pada-prakarana with Laghu-vrtti (Deva- candra Lālabhāī Jaina Pustakoddhāra, no 68). Bombay, 1926	NPP
Devasena. Bhāva-saṃgraha in Bhāva-saṃgrahādi (Māṇi-kacandra Digambara Jaina Granthamālā, no. 20). Bombay, 1922.	BhS (D)
Devendra Srāddha-dina-krtya (Rsabhadeva Kešarīmala Jaina Švetāmbara Samsthā). Ratlam, 1937.  — Bhāṣya-traya (Ātmānanda Grantha-ratna-mālā, no	ŚrDK
15) Bhavnagar, 1912. — Cattya-vandana-bhäsya with Sanghācāra-vṛtti. Surat, 1938.	CVBh
Gunabhūşaņa. Śravakācāra. Surat, 1925.
Haribhadra. Śrāvaka-dharma-pañcāśaka with Cūrni of Yaśodeva (Devacandra Lālabhai Jaina Pustakod- dhāra, no. 102). 1952.	P (Y)
Pañcăśaka with commentary of Abhayadeva (Rṣabhadeva Keśarīmala Jama Śvetāmbara Samsthā). Ratlam. 1941.

! The symbols on the right indicate the abbreviations used in the footnotes.

XXVIII	BIBLIOGRAFTI
Haribhadra: Abhavadeva	's commentary on the Śrāvakadharma-pañcāśaka is	quoted as	P (A) and the text of the i	ndividual Pañcāśakas as:
Śrāvaka-dharma-pañ	icāśaka	P (ŚrDh)
Vandana-vidhāna-pa	ncasaka	P (Vanda
Pûjā-vidhāna-pañcāś		P Pūjā)
Yātrā-vidhi-pañcāśal		P (Yātrā)
Sramanopāsaka-prat		P (SrUP)
	ted with translation by L. Suali in	DLD.
GSAI xxi (1908), 224-		DhB
(Agamodaya Samiti) I	ith commentary of Municandra mmentary on Cartya-vandana-
Lanca-vistara Con	bhāi Jama Pustakoddhāra, no 29).
Bombay, 1915	mai jamar ustakoudnara, no 29).	LV ra (Bibliotheca Indica, no. 172).
Calcutta, 1907-21.	a (Dibliotition situation) and a typy	YŚ na-kulaka (Jinadatta Süri Prācīna Pustakoddhāra, no 11	). Bombay, 1920.
	guna-vivarana (Åtmänanda Gran-
the-ratne-mālē, no. 29		SrGuV
	(Jñānapītha Mūrtidevī Jama	140
Granthamālā, no. 9)		MP
bay, 1960.	rekṣā,ed by A.N Upadhye Bom-	KA
	-prābhrta in Şat-prābhṛtādi-	14.71
	dra Digambara Jaina Granthamālā,
no. 17). Bombay, 1920
Mānavijaya Dharma-s	samgraha with commentary of Yaśovijaya (Devacand	ra Lālabhāī Jama Pustakoddhāra,
no. 26). Bombay, 19
	a Dharma-samgraha-śrāvakācāra.
Benares, 1910.		Śr (M)
	-sāroddhāra (Devacandra Lālabhāī	PS
	nos 58, 64). Bombay, 1922-6 a-rasāvana in Siddhānta-sārādi-	PS a-rasayana in Siddhanta-saradi- ndra Digambara Jama Granthamala, no. 21). Bomba
Śrāvakācāra Belgi
Pūjā-prakarana in Tati	tvärtha-sūtra (Bibliotheca Indica,
no. 159). Calcutta, 19	03-5.
Rājamalla: Lāṭī-samhiti	å (Māṇikacandra Digambara Jama
Granthamālā, no. 26	) Bombay, 1927.
Jñānasāgara. Calcutt	sāra ascribed to Kundakunda, ed
Ramasekhara Sraddha	s, 1934 -vidhi (Ātmānanda Grantha-ratna-mālā, no. 48) Bhavni	- RUIS-BUIUS CALBUING CALBUING-
	-śrāvakācāra. Surat, 1927.

BIBLIOGRAPHY	XXI
Samantabhadra: Ratma-karaŋda-friyakisdira with com- mentary of Prabhāsendra (Māṇukacandra Dīgambara Jama Granthamālā, no. 24). Bombay, 1926. Sam Sūri. Dharma-ratma-prakarana (Atmānanda Gran- tha-ratma-mālā, no. 36). Bhavangar, 1913. Svakor: Ratma-mālān Sūdchānta-sārādi-sangrapha(Mān- kacandra Dīgambara Jama Granthamālā, no. 21). Bom- kacandra Dīgambara Jama Granthamālā, no. 21). Bom-	RK Dhrp bay, 1922. Somadeva: Yaśastilaka (Kāvya-mālā, no. 70). Bombay, 1901-3. References to this work are quoted from. K. K. Handiqui: Yaśastilaka and Indian Culture (Jivarāja Jaina Granthamālā, no 2). Sholapur, 1949. Somasena. Traivarqukācāra, ed by Pannalāl Sonī. Bombay, 1925. Śrāddha-pratikramana-sūtra with Vandāru-vrtti of Devendra (Devendra (Devendra Lēlabbāl Jaina Pustakoddhāra, no. 8). Bombay, 1912. Śrāddha-pratikramana-sūtra with commentary of Ratna-	Handiqui TrA sékhara (Devacandra Lalabhāt Janna Pustakoddhāra, no. 48) Bombay, 1919 Srāvaka-dhatma-dohaka (or Sāvaya-dhamma-dohā), ed. by Hiralal Jan (Karanja Jan Senes, no. 2) Karanja, 1923. Umasvāmm. Tattvārtha-sūtra with Sarāvātha-sūddh of Pijyspāda (Jāinapitha Mūrndevi Janna Granthamālā, no. 13) Benares, 1955.  — Reality an English translaton of the Sarāvātha-sūddh, by S. A. Jan (Vīrašāsana Sangha) Calcutta, 1960.	Doha T (P)
— Tattvārtha-sūtra with commentary of Siddhasena (Devacandra Lālabhāi) jana Pustakoddhāra, no. 76). Bombay, 1930. Umāsvāt Srāvaka-prajāapti Bombay, 1905 Vāmadeva Bhāva-samgraha in Bhāva-samgrahād (Māṇ-kacandra Digambara Jaina Granthamālā, no. 20). Bombay, 1922 Vardhamāna. Acāra-dinskara (Kharatara Gaccha Granthamālā, no. 2) Bombay, 1923. Vardhamāna. Srāvakicāra, 6d. by Hiralai Jain (Jāšanpītha	T (S) SrPr BhS (V) ADK
Mürtidevi Jama Granthamälä, Prakrit series, no. 3). Upässka-dašäh with commentary of Abhayadeva, ed. with trans. by Hoernle, (Bibliotheca Indica, no. 105). Calcutta, 1890.	Śr (V)

B. OTHER WORKS AND ARTICLES

F. Belloni-Filippi: Yoga-çästra in GSAI xxi (1908). G. K. Bruhn: Šīlānkas Cauppaṇnamahāpunsacanya (Alt- und Neu-Indische Studien, no. 8). Hamburg, 1954.

- G. Buhler: Über das Leben des Jama-Mönches Hemacandra, Vienna, 1889.
- M B Desa: Jama sāhitya no itihās. Bombay, 1927. H. von Glasenapp: Der Jamismus, Berlin, 1925
- H. Jacobi Samarâicca Kahā (Bibliotheca Indica, no 169). Calcutta, 1008-26.

Iggdish Chandra Iain, Life in Ancient India Bombay, 1947.

Jagmandarlal Jain: Outlines of Jainism. Cambridge, 1940.

Jinavijaya Muni: Haribhadra Süii kā samaya-nuṇaya in Jaina Sālutya Samiodhaka, Part I.

P. V. Kane · History of Dharmasastra Bombay, 1930-58

K von Kamptz. Über die vom Sterbefasten handelnden \u00e4lteren Painna des Jaina-Kanons. Hamburg, 1929.

W. Kirfel: Symbolik des Hinduismus und des Jinismus Stuttgart, 1959.
 and L. Hilgenberg Übersetzung von Astängahrdaya. Leiden, 1941.

J. Klatt, Specimen of a Literary-Bibliographical Jaina-Onomasticon Leipzig, 1892

J. F. Kohl. Pflanzen mit gemeinsamen Korper in Zeitschrift fur Ethnologie, Bd. 78/1 (1953).

 Einige Bemerkungen zur Zahlensymbolik und zum Animismus im botanischen System des Jama-Kanon in Studia Indologica, pp. 125–35.

Bonn, 1955. E. Leumann, Übersicht über die Ävasyaka-Literatur Hamburg, 1934.

J. J. Meyer: Trilogie altindischer Machte und Feste der Vegetation

Zurich, 1937. Jugalkisor Mukhtar Grantha-pariksa Bombay, 1917

Jugaikisor Mukhtar Grantha-pariksa Bombay, 1917
— Purătana Jaina vâkyasūci (Vira Sevā Mandira Granthamālā, no. 5)
Sarsawa, 1950.

Nåthuram Premi Jama sahitya aur itihas Bombay, 1942

J. Przyluski · La Grande Déesse, Paus, 1950

V A Sangave Jama Community Bombay, 1959.

W Schubring Die Lehre der Jamas Berlin, 1935.

Kundakunda echt und unecht in ZDMG cvii (1957), pp. 554-74
 Das Mahanisiha-Sutta (Abh. d Pieuss Akad. d. Wiss., Berlin, 1018).

M. N. Sunivas. Marriage and Family in Mysore Bombay, 1942.

H. D. Velankar Jina-ratna-kośa. Poona, 1944.

E. Windisch Yoga-śūstra in ZDMG xxviii (1874), pp 185-262

M. Winternitz. History of Indian Literature, vol. 11. Buddhist and Jaina Literature Calcutta, 1933.

THE AUTHORS-SVETAMBARA SAMPRADĀYA<sup>1</sup>

Umāsvāti	Śrāvaka-prajñapti	5th century (?)
Haribhadra Vırahānka	Pańcāśaka	ob. 529 (?)
Haribhadra Yākınī-putra	Dharma-bindu	c. 750
	Lalita-vistarā
11 11	Āvašyaka commentary	,,
Siddhasena Ganin	Tattvārtha-sútra commen- tary	9th century (?)
Dhanapāla	Śrāvaka-vidhi	c. 970
Devagupta	Nava-pada-prakarana with commentary	1016
Sāntı Sūrı	Dharma-ratna-prakarana	ob 1040
Abhayadeya	Upāsaka-daśāh commen-	1061
	tary
	Pañcāśaka commentary	1068
Nemicandra	Pravacana-sāroddhāra	11th century (?)
Municandia	Dharma-bindu commentary	ob. 1122 (?)
Yaśodeva	Paňcásaka commentary	1116
Hemacandra	Yoga-śāstra	1089-1172
Sıddhasena Süri	Pravacana-sāroddhāra commentary	1185
Devendra	Śrāddha-dina-kṛtya	ob. 1270
21	Vandāru-vrtti commentary	,,
	Bhāsya-traya	,,
Dharmaghosa	Śrāddha-jita-kalpa
,,	Sanghācāra	C 1270
Jinadatta	Castya-vandana-kulaka	c. 1300
	Pūjā-prakarana	14th century (?)
Jinadatta	Viveka-vilāsa	14th century(?)
Vardhamāna	Ācāra-dinakara	1411
Căritrasundara	Ācāropadeśa	1430
Jınamandana	Śrāddha-guṇa-śreni- saṃgraha	1441
Ratnaśckhara	Śrāddha-vidhi	1450
Yaśovijaya	Dharma-samgraha com-	1624-88

Umāsvāti

mentary Amongst the works usually ascribed to Umasvati the Vacaka at least three have a bearing on the śrāvakācāra: the Tattvārtha-sūtra.

1 The chronology here, and still more in the Digambara sampradāya, is often uncertain, and all that has been attempted in this list is to establish rather hesitantly the sequence of the authors.

the Śrāvaka-prajñaptı, and the Pūjā-prakaraṇa. The last-named is patently spurious and need not concern us here: it will be discussed in its proper place in the chronological sequence; and there is equally convincing internal evidence that the Śrāvaka-prajñapti cannot be by the same hand as the famous Sūtra.

Consider first the seventh adhyāya of the Tattvārtha-sūtra, the only section devoted-and that only in part-to the lay life. Here the Svetambara and Digambara recensions do not differ except in the numbering, as sūtras 4 to 8, which are missing from the Svetämbara version, have in fact been transferred to the bhasva.1 Yet the text as accepted by the Svetämbaras shows some curious features. First, in sutra 18 it is specified that the layman, before he can take the gratas, must be devoid of the three salvas, elsewhere this condition is only laid down in the Digambara śrāvakācāi as, indeed the term does not seem to find a mention in Svetambara texts, Secondly, the sequence of the vratas in sūtra 21 does not follow the model of the Upāsaka-daśāh which is rigidly observed in the Svetāmbara tradition and, by making the desāvakāsika-vrata follow the dip-prata, violates the principle by which practices of brief duration repeated at intervals are confined to the category of the śiksā-vratas. Thirdly, in sūtra 24 the term śila is used in a sense, normal in Digambara works but not elsewhere admitted by the Svetāmbaras, to designate the guna-vratas and siksā-viatas. Fourthly, for the satya-, bhogopabhoga-, anartha-danda-, posadhopaväsa-, and sallekhanā-viatas the aticaras listed diverge markedly from the schema of the Svetämbara texts, which, apart from the Dharma-hindu, adhere unvaryingly to the Upāsaka-dasāh pattern until the time of Hemacandra Fifthly, the information supplementary to the vratas is limited to a couple of sūtras (28 and 20) emphasizing the importance of dana, no mention at all being made of the avasyakas, which are given very extensive treatment in all the Svetāmbara śrāvakācāras As the matas and their aticāras represent the nucleus of the whole lay doctrine any variation in their presentation must be of considerable significance; and for these reasons the Tattvartha-sutra cannot, from the point of view of the śrāvakācāra, be regarded as a Śvetāmbara work.

The Śrāvaka-prajňaptı,2 on the contrary, is a typically Śvetām-

&lt;sup>1</sup> The bhāṭya, which is markedly Śvetāmbara in tone, is considered by that sect to have been written by Umāsvāti himself

&lt;sup>2</sup> There is, incidentally, a reference to a Săvaga-pannatti in the Vasudeva-hindi (p. 185)

bara production, in style and content very closely related to the Pañcāśakas: its treatment of the vratas is exactly in accord with that of the Ubāsaka-daśāh, and it deals extensively with the āvasvakas. When the text was published in 1905 the editor, Keshavlal Premchand, in a brief introduction in Sanskrit, discussed whether the work should be attributed to Haribhadra, to Umasvati the Vācaka, or to some other Umāsvāti. In support of the first hypothesis he cited two rather ambiguous passages, one of them drawn from Abhavadeva's commentary on the Pañcāśakas. However, in another quotation from the same work Umasvati is described as the author of the Śrāvaka-prajñapti, and the assertion is repeated by Municandra in his commentary on the Dharma-bindu, and at a much later date by Yasovijava in the Dharma-sameraha, More striking is an explanation by Yasodeva,2 in his commentary on the Śrāvaka-dha ma-pańcāśaka, of the reasons which prompted Haribhadra to compose his treatise when Umasvati had already written the basic text on the subject, from which it is not unreasonable to infer that the Śrāwaka-praiñapii was already regarded by the Svetämbaras as the first compilation exclusively devoted to sravakacāra. That Haribhadra was the author of the work seems excluded by this evidence, though certain of its verses are in fact found repeated in the Pina-pañcasaka 3

It may well be that the shared ascription of the Tatteārtha-sitra and the Śrāvaka-prajāaptı results from a confusion of name (the use by the Śvetāmbaras of the form Umāsvātu when the Digambaras prefer Umāsvāmin lends added probability to the hypothesis) and that there in fact existed a Švetāmbara ācārya named Umāsvāt to whom the Tatteārtha-sātra, when it had already acquired general fame as an exposition of the doctrine, came also the attributed In any event the two works are incontestably of different authorship, and it may be added that the development of the iricukātāra is only understandable if the Tattrārtha-sūtra is regarded as belonging originally to the Digambaras.

The Śrāvaka-prajñapta is written in Prakrit and runs to some 400 verses. It contains a brief exposition of certain Jama doctrines,

I am unable to trace any of these quotations

<sup>2</sup> P(Y) 1 (p 2)

&lt;sup>3</sup> In fact SrPr 345 = P (Pūjā) 41; SrPr 348 = P (Pūjā) 44, SrPr 349 = P

(Pūjā) 45.
I have adopted the form Umāsvātt for the author of the Śrāvaka-prajñapti and the form Umāsvāmın for the author of the Tattvārtha-sūtra.

THE AUTHORS-SVETÄMBARA SAMPRADÄYA

particularly the nature of jiva and karman; a description of tamyaktra and its aticāras; a fairly lengthy analysis and refutation of arguments commonly advanced by opponents of ahmaā; a list of the twelve vratas and their aticāras with particular attention to the āmānynka; a summary of the ritual of pūjā and castya-vandana with an indication of the dina-caryā, the ideal pattern for each day's life, a description of sallekhanā; and a final exordium on the attainment of moksa. If the anteriority of this work to the Pañcāiāhas is taken as established it cannot be held to be later than the firth century. Printed with the text is the Sanskrit commentary of Haribhadra, large sections of which, in particular those dealing with the aticāras of the viatas, are identical with the corresponding passaers of his Artaviaha commentary.

HARIBHADRA VIRAHĀNKA

It was in 1919 that Muni Jinavijayaji, in a paper read to the First All-India Oriental Conference in Poona, showed that certain works ascribed to Haribhadra Süri must, because of the authors quoted and the views expressed in them, be subsequent to the year 529 in which the most commonly accepted Jamatradition places his death. Further arguments in support of a later date were to be drawn from Muni Kalyāṇayiaya's introduction to the Dharma-tangra-han, and the conclusions were reviewed and confirmed by Jacobi in his introduction to the Sanarānca-hahā, published in 1926. In all this there was a tacit assumption that the whole of the literary production ascribed to Haribhadra was the work of one man, although already, much earlier, Klatt had noted the existence of several authors of that name.

Amongst the writings attributed to Haribhadra there are a number which are concerned with sirāvakācāra, notably the Dharma-bundu, the Panīcāsishas, and the commentaries on the Āraāyaka, the Sirāvaka-piajināpti, and the Castya-vandama-stira. As a commentator is always to some extent limited by his text it will be preferable to take a look at the first two, which are original works. They show differences as considerable as those which were apparent between the Tattvärtha-sūtra and the Śrāvaka-praiñapti. In the first place whilst the Śrāvaka-dharma-pañcāśaka is indistinguishable from the Śrāvaka-prajňapti in its rigid adherence to the Svetambara tradition of reproducing the vratas and their aticaras, the Dharma-bindu follows for the satva-, bhogopabhogaanartha-danda-, and posadhopavāsa-vratas (the sallekhanā-vrata is not treated in the śrāvakācāra section of this work) the model of the Tattvartha-satra, except that for the third aticara of the satva-vrata the form sva-dara-mantra-bheda is preferred to sakaramantra-bheda.1 However, the more logical Syetambara sequence of puna-vratas and siksā-vratas is followed. At the same time there are indications in the Dharma-bindu that its author had access to a much wider Sanskrit culture than is shown by the writer of the Pañcāsakas, whose outlook seems bounded by Jaina tradition. Like the Tattvārtha-sūtra the Dharma-hindu is written in sūtra style whilst the Pañcāśakas are composed in Prakrit verses that appear perceptibly archaic when compared, for example, with the Dhurtākhvāna, another Prakrit work attributed to Haribhadra,

<sup>1</sup> In the present study I have generalized the use of this convenient term employed by Hemacandra (YŚ no. 122)

See Muni Jinavijaya, Haribhadra Süri kā samaya-nirnaya in Jaina Śāhitya Samiodhaka, pi i, and for a summary of the arguments about Haribhadra's date Winternut, History of Indian Literature, n. 470

&lt;sup>3</sup> Klatt, Specimen of a Literary-Bibliographical Jana-Onomasticon, pp. 5, 8.

If we examine the legends associated with the life of Haribhadra as they are recounted by various writers all separated from the period in which he is held to have lived by very considerable intervals of time, these are seen to centre around two incidents; that he was converted to Jamism because he was impressed by the superior knowledge of the nun Yakını Mahattara, and that he was afflicted by remorse because he had provoked the death of certain Buddhists who had murdered his two nephews. With the second legend is associated the figure of 1,400 or 1,444-both are familiar round numbers in Jainism-given as the total of the works he is supposed to have written, as well as the use of the word viraha as an anka in the concluding verses of his works, and there is a reminiscence of the former in the colophon sometimes found; krtir ivam Sıtambaracaryasya Jinabhatta-nıgadanusarıno Yakıni-mahattarasūnor Haribhadrasva. It would not then seem unreasonable to suggest that the works bearing this colophon may belong to one writer of the name of Haribhadra and those signed with the anka to another. Of course the wide currency of the colourful narrative by which the añka is explained, and the ease with which terminal verses can be manufactured by a copyist for a prose treatise will have made it not unlikely that the añka may in some cases be spurious; at any rate by its nature it is peculiarly susceptible of being forged.

Haribhadra's avoidance of the Tattvärtha-sūtra variant seems to confirm the supposition that this may have been originally a textual corruption

If we examine from this angle the texts under discussion, the printed editions of the Lahta-vistara, Avasyaka, and Śrāvakaprajuapti commentaries are all seen to have colophons basically identical with the specimen just given. (So too has the Prakrit Dhurtakhvana.) Each Pañcasaka, on the other hand, shows in its concluding verse the anka. These short treatises of approximately, but not always, exactly fifty verses are all written in a rather archaic Māhārāstrī Prakrit which, particularly in the occurrence of particles which are said to be merely pada-puranas and in the use of the cases, confronts the commentators with problems which they can only answer by the phrase prakrta-sailatvat. The language contrasts markedly with the conventional Maharastri of the Dhurtakhyāna. The verses have clearly an essentially mnemonic value and are designed to be studied with the aid of a commentary indeed without it they are often unintelligible. Nothing in them suggests acquaintance with non-Jaina milieux. On the other hand the three commentaries in Sanskrit give evidence of a very wide and not purely Jaina crudition. It is of particular interest to note in the Avasvaka commentary the treatment of the atwaras of those vratas for which the Tattvartha-sūtra has introduced innovations. These are interpreted on conventional Svetambara lines except for the explanation of the third aticara of the bhogopabhogu-vrata, apakvausadhi where a variant reading (pāthāntara) sacitta-sammiśrāhāra is noted Admittedly the text is undeviatingly traditional. but that is no reason for supposing that the authorship of the commentary is different from that of the Dharma-bindu, Yet the Dharma-bindu, as printed, has no colophon but, on the contrary, a concluding verse with the anka which must therefore here be assumed to be sourious

What, then, I would here suggest is that the revised dating of Haribhadra (A.D. 750) introduced by Muni Jinavijaya should be assumed only for that Haribhadra who is, intre alia, the author of the three commentaries mentioned, the Dharma-bindu, and the Dhūrzābhyāna, and that for works written in archauc Māhārāṣtrī and bearing the anka the Jinav tradition that the died in 750 should be retained. On this basis the Pañcāśakas would belong to the beginning of the sixth century A.D.

Something has already been said to indicate their characteristic peculiarities. In the printed edition they are nineteen in number, the first ten of them relating to the lay life. Of these the most important for the śrāvakācāra are the śrāvaka-dharma-, vandana-vidhāna-, pūjā-vidhāna-, stavo-vidhi-, yātrā-vidhi-, and śramano-pāsaka-pratimā-pañsākslaya-

SIDDHASENA GANIN

Apart from the concise bhasya which by the Svetambaras is said to be the work of Umasvati himself but which must, if the Tattvārtha-sūti a is Digambara, be by another hand, the best-known Svetambara commentary on the Tattvartha-sūtra is that of Siddhasena Ganin. This author, who is distinct from the more celebrated Siddhasena Diväkara and the much later Siddhasena Süri who wrote the commentary on the Pravacana-sāroddhāra, records ın his colophon that hıs guru was Bhāsvāmin and his guru's guru Simhasura, pupil himself of Dinna Ganin, but these details offer no secure basis for dating. Reference is made in the vvakhva to certain other works and if the Dharmakirti author of the Pramanaviniscava mentioned is the Buddhist writer of the seventh century, Siddhasena cannot well be much earlier than A.D. 800.2 In numerous passages there is an identity of phraseology in the discussion of the aticaras of the viratas between the Tattvartha-sūtra-vvākhvā and Haribhadra's Avasvaka-vrtti, so striking that it seems almost inevitable that one must have borrowed from the other: it would seem that Siddhasena was the horrower.

HARIBHADRA YÄKINĪ-PUTRA

If we accept the existence of two major figures of the name of Haribhadra it is to the second, whose date was fixed by Jinavijaya at circa A.D. 750, that belong the Dharma-bindu and the Śrāvakaprajñaptı, Āvaśyaka, and Cartya-vandana-sūtra commentaries.

&lt;sup>1</sup> An exhaustive study of all works attributed to Harbhadra could confirm or mivaldate this hypothesis. Only a few of them are available in good editions and the overall picture is very confused. Thus verses 1-2 and 38-120 of the work the totle Strötech-ardhir-prokarama are identical with verses 1-2 and 59-20 of the work-diarma-prictables. It would probably be found that and 8-50 of the Strötech-albarma-prictables. It would probably be found that the appellation Harbhadra embraces more than the two authors distinguished above. One fact seems certain that the Dharma-bindu and the Palicaldakar cannot be by the same hand.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See T (S), vol. ii, Introduction, p. 63, and ABORI xiii. 335-

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix.

The Dharma-bindu is a compilation of rules of conduct both for the layman and the ascetic, written, in evident imitation of the Tattvārtha-sūtra, in Sanskrit sūtras clearer and more elegant than those of its prototype. Only the first three adhyavas are relevant to the śravakacara. The first draws a picture of the ideal layman by listing the qualities which should enter into his make-up; though the term is not used these represent in effect the earliest traceable enumeration of what Hemacandra calls the śrāvaka-gunas. The second adhyāya deals with methods of expounding the dharma, both by precept and example, and is clear evidence that Jamism was still a proselytizing religion. The third adhyāva is in itself a śrāvakācāra in miniature from which nothing essential is omitted. The exposition of samyaktva and the vratas and their aticaras is followed by a picture of the daily round of life from dawn to dusk which provides a framework in which to include dana and baia and the six āvašvakas. This section offers in brief compass an example of the dına-carvā which was later taken as a model for 'ravakācāras of the type of the Śrāddha-dma-krtva. As has already been noted Haribhadra follows the Tattvartha-sutra in his delineation of the vratas and their aticaras; whilst for the anasyakas and other daily duties his pattern is the Śrāvaka-prajñapti

DHANAPALA

This compiler of a short Prakrit verse treatise on the lay life, the Srāvaka-vulhī, is presumably to be identified with the author of the Tilaka-mañjari and the Rsabha-pañcāšaka, whoflourished about A.D. 970.1

DEVAGUPTA

Devagupta, a sūrı of the Upakeśa Gaccha, pupil of Kakka Acārya, and known as Jinacandra Caṇin before his dikṣā, tells us that, although the sirāsuka-nharma has been expounded in many ways by the ācāryas of old, his Nava-pada-prakarana is the first attempt to present it by treating samyaktva, mithyātva, and the vratas each from nine angles. These are: the nature of the vrata

Winternitz, op. cit, pp. 534, 553 The text of the Śrāvaka-vidhi was not accessible to me 2 NPP 137 (p. 61b) (yadig bhild); the varieties of it (bheda); how it comes into existence (yadig jāyate); the evil arising from neglecting it (dota); the good arising from carrying it out(gura); the striving to be made(yatanā); its aticāras, its bhangas; and the themes of meditation on it (bhāvanā). The subject-matter can only with difficulty be accommodated to this strait jacket and it is open to doubt if Devagupta was successful in his innovation. To explain his text, written in rather crabbed Prakrit verse, the author himself composed a Sanskit commentary, the Laghu-ortit, completed in sameat 1073. There is another, much more extensive, commentary composed in sameat 1165 by Yaśodeva, whose identity with the author of the commentary on the Srāvaka-dharma-pañcāiaka² cannot be excluded. Devagupta himself is also the author of the Nava-tattea-prakarana, and is saud to have written a commentary on the Tattvāriha sitra.

SANTI SÜRI

Sānti Sīri of the Candrakula Gaccha, who is said to have died in AD. 1040, was the author of the Sīra-vicāra and of the Dharma-ratna-prakarana, a Prakiri verse tract on the qualities of the ideal layman and the ideal monk, which is of interest primarily as the earliest literary source for the 21 sīrāvaka-gunas. These, together with the six types of bhāva-sīrāvaka, are described in the first 77 stanzas whilst the remaining 68 are devoted to the delineation of the bhāva-sārāhu.

The Sanskrit vrth, printed with the text and attributed on the title-page to Santi Sūri himself, is stated by Schubring to be by Devendra Commentaries both by Santi Sūri and by Devendra are mentioned as existing in manuscript.4

ABHAYADEVA

Abhayadeva, a sūrt of the Candrakula Gaccha, was a very celebrated commentator on the canon. Both his vivaraņa on the Upāsaka-dašāh in samvat 11175 and his Pañcāsaka-vrtti in samvat

- I NIDD
- <sup>2</sup> Thus Yaśodeva, in his Pañcāiaka commentary, quotes not only verses from the Nava-pada-prakarana but a large number of otherwise unidentified verses which are found in Devagupu's Laghu-oriti
  - 3 See Schubring, Die Lehre der Jamas, p 223.
  - Velankar, Jina-ratna-kośa, p 191.

5 Ibid , p 55.

11241 cover the field of śrāvakācāra. Older works utilized by him include the Śrāvaka-prajñapti, the commentaries of Haribhadra, and the Nava-pada-prakarana.

NEMICANDRA

Nemicandra, pupil of Amradeva, pupil of Jinabhadra, is distinct from the other Nemicandra, author of the vrtti on the Uttaradhvāvana-sūtra, who before dīksā was called Devendra Ganin.2 His Pranacana-săroddhāra is a Prakrit verse compendium of Jaina philosophy, ethics, and ritual set out as far as possible in the form of numerical apotherms. Some of these, such as the lists of abhaksvas and ananta-kāvas, are of considerable importance for the development of the śrāvakācāra. In a compendium of this kind much will certainly have been borrowed and the fact that one of the verses on the ananta-kāyas is quoted by Abhayadeva in his commentary on the Śrāvaka-dharma-pañcāśaka is without significance as Nemicandra has quoted them from an earlier source. It is of more interest that the verses on the twenty-one sravaka-gunas have been incorporated in the text of the Pravacana-sāroddhāra as this would show that Nemicandra is not at any rate earlier than Santi Sūri unless the latter had taken them over ready-made from another writer. It is difficult therefore to give more than a vague approximation of the author's date. He is not later than the twelfth century, as the commentary by Siddhasena Sürı was completed in samvat 1242,3 and he may well be considerably earlier. He mentions in verse 470 a Candra Sūri, who cannot be the ācārya who wrote a commentary on the Avasyaka-sūtra in A.D. 1165.4 but may be the same as the author of a Mumicumatan aritra

MUNICANDRA

Nothing seems to be known with certainty of the author of the commentary on the Dharma-bindu According to Weber he died in A.D 1122 He may or may not be identical with the author of a Prakrit Gatha-kośa and a Ratna-trava-kulaka or with the fortieth ācārya in Klatt's list of the Tapā Gaccha,5

YAŚODEVA

Yasodeva, of the Candrakula Gaccha-his guru was Candra

- Velankar, Jina-ratna-kosa, p 231 2 Ibid., p 271 3 Ibid., p. 272. Winternitz, op cit., p. 496
- 5 Sualı in GSAI xxi (1908), 232.

Sūrı and his guru's guru Vīra Ganin—completed his cūrṇi on the first three Pañcālakas, only the first of which has been published, in sameat 1172. This commentary is of special interest because it is written in Prakrit (a very clear Māhārāstrī prose), and because though the author is careful to say that he has followed Abhayadeva in his interpretation of the text' he has in fact given much additional information derived from earlier sources. He also composed in 1180 a vrtti on the Pāksika-sūtra and is perhaps identical with the author of the Brhad-vrtti on the Nava-pada-prakaraṇa.

HEMACANDRA

The Kalı-kāla-sarvayāa, as this remarkable man was even in his infetime styled, though he lacked perhaps the originality of mini of Haribhadra Yākinī-putru, surpassed hum in the range of his knowledge. There was scarcely a branch of literature or science as then known to which he did not contribute, and his influence both on his contemporaries and on the whole subsequent history of Svetimbara Jamism and through Xāsdhara to some extent even on the Digambaras can scarcely be overestimated. It may reasonably be suggested that as a poet he overrated himself but he wrote excellent Sanshri troses, only slightly tinged with peculiarities that are sometimes described as Jana but might with more proprietive regarded as characteristic of Gujarat. To a greater degree than any other Jana writer he had a gift for the marshalling of facts and for clear and orderly exposition.

By brith a Gujaratu and a member of a merchant caste he played a prominent role in the politics of his homeland and for this reason perhaps the facts of his long life (A.D. 108g-1172) are fairly well documented as they can be found in Buhler's narrative,<sup>4</sup> it would be superfluous to go into them her.

His main contribution to intrabalizara is to be found in the Yegastatta, or Adhytimopanisal, an encyclopedic compilation on the duties of laymen and ascetics of which only the first three prakaitar are here of relevance. The substance of the work lies less in the text, which, written apparently in obedience to the fashion of the day in verse, serves only as an outline, than in the commentary. This is easy to read, rich in facts, and supported by quotations from the most diverse sources. It is only to be regretted that, except when citing from other works of his own composition, Hemacandra rarely names his sources, but it is clear that he made extensive use of the Srāvaha-prajitapti, the Pañcāiahar with Abhayadeva's commentaries, the Dharma-bināu, and Siddhasena's commentary on the Tatvārtha-sūtra. The Yoga-ūstra belongs to the close of his life, having been written about 1160.

&lt;sup>1</sup> P(Y), p. 158 a P(Y), p. 1.

P(Y), Upodghāta, pp. 11-13.

Bühler, Über das Leben des Jaina-Mönches Hemacandra, Vienna, 1889

The first prakasa of the work evokes certain general principles of Jainism and sets forth the thirty-five śrāvaka-gunas. The second brakāša discusses samyaktva, its gunas and aticāras (1-17), condemning animal sacrifices, extols the virtues of ahimsā (18-49); and outlines the nature of the other four anu-cratas. The third brakāja begins by explaining the guna-vratas (including under the bhogopabhoga-vrata such topics as ratri-bhojana and all that the Digambaras would understand by the mula-gunas) and siksa-vratas (1-88); and then goes on to list the aticaras of the twelve viatas (80-119), and to inculcate the necessity of dana (119-21) Verses 122-30, covered by a commentary of over a hundred pages, portray a typical day in the life of a mahā-śrāvaka, thereby affording an opportunity for a detailed treatment of the six avasyakas and the ชนิเลี : subjects of meditation for sleepless nights are given in verses 131-47; and the remaining six verses are given over to a description of sallekhanā.

In view of its very full picture of the life of a layman in twelfthcentury Gujarat it is unfortunate that no translation of the work in a western language exists. Windisch attempted a rendering with his editio princeps of the first four adhyāyar' but this suffered from the handicap that his manuscript contained only the verses without the commentary. For the commencement of the work there is a full translation of text and commentary by Belloni-Filippi in an Italian periodical's but its publication was soon abandoned. Nor does a satisfactory edition of the complete text exist, since that which was published in the Bibhotheca Indica has remained unfinished.

SIDDHASENA SÜRI

Little is known of this ācārya, author also of a Padmaprabhacaritra. His exhaustive commentary on the Pravacana-sāroddhāra is dated A.D. 1185.<sup>1</sup> The sections dealing with the vratas and their aticāras have been borrowed with scarcely any changes in phraseology from the Yoga-iāstra, written only a quarter of a century earlier.

&lt;sup>1</sup> ZDMG 28. <sup>2</sup> GSAI xx1. 122-222 (1908).

DEVENDRA

For the medieval period the last major work on traeukhääna is the Srādalha-dima-krtya of Devendra, a sārī of the Tapā Gaccha and pupil of Jagaccandra Sūrī, who is said to have died at Malwa in A.D. 1270.3 The text consists of 342 verses in conventional Māḥā-rāṣtī Prakrit and is divided into eight prastāras. On this framework the author has constructed his own voluminous Sanskrit commentary, in bulk largely made up of illustrative stories. The pattern is that of the dima-caryā, the duties of a Jaina layman being outlined first for the day and then for the fortnight, the month, and the year, so that the main emphasis is on the ārdayhaka, the pūjā, and the individual's obligations to the community. The vratas and their aticāras are covered by Devendra's own commentary—the Vandāru-vrlu—on the Pratikramaqas-stāra, which he has incorporated into the Srādahha-dima-krtya. He has also treated certain elements of the ritual seoarately in the Farkit bhāšīva-trawa.

Devendra quotes from the Śrāvaka-prapiaptı, the Pañadiakas, the Nava-pada-p akarana, and the Dharma-ratna-prakarana. His treatment of the vratas and their aticā as is in accordance with the orthodox Śvetāmbara tradition and shows no trace of the innovations made by Haribhadra and Hemacandra, but it is difficult to believe that he was not acquainted with the Yoga-äätra and not indebted to it for the general plan of his work. Like almost all Jaina writers subsequent to Hemacandra, he shows by his references to such works as the Manu-impti and the Yātryāyana-kāma-sātra² that he was open to the general currents of Sanskrit cultural.

DHARMAGHOSA

This sūrī of the Tapā Gaccha, the pupil and successor of Devendra, is often known by the name of Dharmakīrti, which was his prior to dīksā. 4 He is the author of a Prakrit Śrāddha-jita-kalpa in 141 verses conceived as a sort of appendix to the 'fita-kalpa-ūtra,'s and of the Sanghācāra commentary on the Castya-vandanabhāṣya of his master Devendra. This latter work is stated to be not later than samuat 1327.1

SrDK, pr 11, p 95.

Schubring, Die Lehre der Jainas, p. 181.

ITNADATTA

Jinadatta Sūrı of the Kharatara Gaccha, who would seem to belong to the thirteenth century A.D., wrote a Caitya-vandanakulaka in Prakrit verse on which, in samuat 1383, Jinakuśala of the same gaccha composed a voluminous Sanskrit commentary consisting mainly of illustrative stories,2

THE PULL-PRAKARANA

This twenty-verse Sanskrit tract on the puja, which has been fathered on Umasvati, is quoted in extenso in the fifteenth-century Śrāddha-vidhi of Ratnaśckhara. However, there is no mention of it in the Śrāddha-dina-krtya of Devendra although these two works cover the same topics and use largely the same sources. It might not be unreasonable therefore to infer that its date lies somewhere between them In view of the constant development of the ritual it is to be expected that endeavours should be made to give to innovations a spurious veneer of antiquity. Whether this tract is excerpted from, or older than, the Visseka-vilāsa is not clear.

INADATTA

The Viveka-vilāsa, a Sanskrit verse manual constructed on the dina-caryā pattern and permeated with accretions from Hinduism, has sometimes been ascribed to the thirteenth century and may be later 3 Fifteen verses from it4 are found also in the Pūjūprakarana. In any event it cannot be the work of the linadatta Sürı who wrote the Cartya-vandana-kulaka Jugalkısor Mukhtar has shown that with the addition of some introductory verses and a false colophon it circulates among Digambaras under the name of the Kundakunda-śrāvakācāra,5

Its contents include elaborate rules for eating and drinking and for excretion, bathing, and sleeping, some general principles of

Velankar, op cit, p 126

It is quoted by Jinsmandana in the Śrāddha-guna-vivarana, by Ratnaśekhara in the Sraddha-vidhi (p 46b), and by Yasovijuya in the Dharma-samgraha (pt. 1, p 126b).

* Vrveka-vilāsa, 1, 85-07

Mukhtar, Grantha-pariksa, pp 26-45

nitt, a list of the laksanas or lucky marks of men and women, some remarks on the technique of yoga, and a long description of remedies for snakebite.

VARDHAMĀNA

This sūri of the Kharatara Gaccha composed an Acūra-dunakara which, owing apparently to a confusion of the author with an acatier namesake, has been falsely ascribed to the eleventh century. This Sanskrit prose treatise on the kriyāt or sāmskāras appropriate to the various phases of like, both lay and monastic, seems to have been the first Švetāmhara work of its kind, but from the fact that the author quotes from Hemacandra's Yoga-tāstra' and because the details, for example, of the pūjā, show a very developed stage, an early date is impossible. Although the ceremonies noticed in the Ācūra-dinakara are very different from the fifty-three kriyās of the Ādū-purāna it seems impossible that these latter were completely unknown to Vardhamāna. Nāthurām Premi³ had already noted that the work could not be as old as was supposed (he suggested samvat 1500), and a recent writer in fact gives its date of complation as samvat 1468 4

CARIFRASUNDARA

Căritrasundara Garun, pupil of Ratnasımha, composed the sameat 1487-5 ît has enjoyed considerable popularity but offers little of interest except in its details of the pājā. The writer is presumably to be identified with the author of an elaborate allegorical dāta-kāvva, the Sila-dāta. Atted A.D. 1420.6

JINAMANDANA

Jinamaṇḍana Ganin was a pupil of Somasundara Sūri of the Tapā Gaccha. He completed his Srāddha-guna-vivaraṇa, more correctly styled, it would seem, the Śrāddha-guṇa-śren-saṃgraha, in saṃwat 1498 in the town of Aṇahilapatṭana in Gujarat.

<sup>1</sup> ADK, p. 43a.

&lt;sup>2</sup> e g. the description of the twenty-one snapanas required for the pratisthal (ADK, pp. 152-c).

<sup>3</sup> Premi, Jaina sähitya aur itihäi, p. 561.

tual (ADK, pp. 152-5).

V. A. Sangave, Jama Community, p. 267.

Velankar, op. cit, p. 25.

Winternitz, op. cit, p. 574.

&lt;sup>7</sup> ŚrGuV prastāvanā, p. 2

16 THE AUTHORS—SVETÄMBARA SAMPRADÄYA

This Sanskrit prose composition on the thirty-five śrāvaka-guṇas is remarkable both for the author's crudition and for the many curious details from Jama tradition which he preserves. At the same time he displays great familiarity with Hindu sources.

RATNAŚEKHARA

Certain details of the life of the $aanya$ of the Tapā Gaccha are available. Born in sameat 1,525, ordained in 1,453, and elevated to the dignity of sūr in 1502, he died in 1517. His writings—the $Aāna-pradipa (1516), the $Srāddha-viāln (1506), and the commentary on the $Srāddha-pratikramana-sutra (1496)—are among the best productions of an age of decadence and show his familiarity with the canon and with the works of Hemacandra and Devendra, though traces of increasing hinduration are everywhere apoparent

The Śrāddha-vidht preserves the fiction of a metrical composition by its framework of seventeen Prakrit gāthās divided into six prakāšas, but these are manifestly only a peg on which to hang a vast Sanskrit prose treatise which imitates in its general outlines to Śrāddha-dina-briya. It might even be described as an adaptation of this work to contemporary conditions. Similarly the Pratikramana commentary represents a more extensive version of Devendra's Vandaru-rriti.

Yaśovijaya

Of the extensive literature on siāvahācāra surviving from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries only one work will retain our attention. In A. D. 1681 Mānavijaya wrote a Dharma-samgraha in Sanskrit verses apparently designed to serve as a vehicle for the comprehensive prose commentary of Yaśovijaya. This great reformer, who lived from 1624 to 1688, sought to regenerate his age by a return to the teachings of the canon and had probably a better command of the whole range of Jaina literature than any man since Heimacandra. In his commentary, modelled on the Yoga-idatra, which he quotes repeatedly, but as only one of many sources, he has shown an extraordinary sureness of touch in rejecting the non-Jaina elements which had invaded the writings of predecessors like Ratnasékhara.

THE AUTHORS—DIGAMBARA SAMPRADĀYA

Kundakunda	Căritra-prăbhrta	and century (?)
Umäsvämin	Tattvärtha-sütra	3rd century (?)
Kärttikeya	Dvādaśānupreksā	4th century (?)
Samantabhadra	Ratna-karanda-śrāvakācāra	c. 450 (2)
Püyapāda	Sarvärtha-siddhi	6th century (2)
	Ratna-sāra	8th century (?)
Jinasena	Ādi-purāna	late oth century
Devasena	Bhava-samgraha	early 10th centur
Somadeva	Yasas-tılaka	959
Amıtagatı	Subhāṣita-ratna-sandoha	993

Srāvakācāra Cāmundarāva Căritra-săra r 1000 Amrtacandra Purusärtha-siddhy-upäya 11th century Śravaka-dharma-dohaka rth century (?) Vasunandın

0.00

Śravakacara Padmanandın Dharma-rasāvana 12th century (?) Äśādhara Sāgāra-dharmāmrta 1240

Mäghanandın Śravekacare c 1260

Gunabhūsaņa Śrāvakācāra c. 1300 (?) Padmanandin Śrāvakācāra 15th century (?) Vāmadeva Bhāva-samgraha 15th century (?) Sakalakīrti Praśnottara-śrāvakācāra 15th century Medhavin Dharma-samgraha-śrāvakācāra 1504 Brahmanemidatta Dharma-pīyusa-śrāvakācāra c. 1530

Rājamalla Lāti-samhıtā 1584 Śivakoti Ratna-mālā 17th century (?)

Somasena Traivarnikācāra 1610

KUNDAKUNDA

C 737

Amongst the many works attributed to Kundakunda two are of some relevance to the śrāvakācāra. The summary of the rules of right conduct given in the Caritra-prabhrta devotes a few verses to the lay life, listing, inter alia, the twelve vratas. The Ratna-sara in view of some of its contents is best ascribed to a considerably later period.

Much has been written on the date of Kundakunda but to little result. The tradition of the Digambara patjāvalīs places him in the first century A.D.1 It is noteworthy that all the works ascribed to him are in Prakrit. Upadhye has placed him in the second century.2

UMASVAMIN

Since Jacobi's3 edition and translation at the end of last century the Tattvārtha-sūtra, the most authoritative exposition of Jaina doctrine, regarded even by the Svetāmbaras with a veneration scarcely less than that accorded to the canon has been too well known to need description. Only the seventh adhyāya is concerned with the lay life.4 Umasyamin's date remains uncertain; according to the Digambara tradition he lived between 125 and 210.

The reasons which have led me to regard, from the aspect of śrāvākācāra, the Tattvārtha-sūtra as a purely Digambara work have been noted above

KARTTIKEYA

About a hundred verses (302 to 391 in the printed edition) of the Dvādašānubreksā or Dharma-bhāvanā of Kārttikeva arc devoted. as part of the dharmanupreksa, to a brief consideration of the lay life; they cover the topics of samvaktva, the twelve vratas (without any indication of the aticaras), sallekhana, and the pratimas.

The dating of Kärttikeva presents considerable difficulties. Upadhye2 would put him later than Yogindu and Pūiyapada. somewhere between the sixth and thirteenth centuries in fact. Jugalkiśor Mukhtars rejects the arguments on which this view is based and regards Kärttikeva as much nearer Umäsvämin in date. The special eulogy of those tirthankaras who were said to have been kumāra-śramanas would also suggest for him that Kārttikeva. too, had taken the monastic initiation whilst still a boy, whilst certain other points such as the general use of the title svāmi with his name would lead to the belief that he belonged to south India.

Winternitz, op cit, p 476

Upadhye, Introduction to KA, pp. 67-70.

<sup>2</sup> ZDMG lx (1906), 287 ff , 512 ff.

Mukhtär has pointed out that there exists a spurious Umäsvämi-śrāvakācāra which is no more than a haphazard assemblage of didactic verses for laymen. taken from Svetämbara as well as Digambara sources (see Granthu-parikjā, pp 1-25).

See Mukhtär, Purātana Jama-vākya sūci prastāvana, pp. 22-27, for a general summary of these arguments.

SAMANTABHADRA

The Ratna-karanda-śrāvakācāra of Samantabhadra would appear to be the earliest Digambara work devoted exclusively to the exposition of the rules of conduct for a layman. It is divided into five paricchedas, the first of which deals with samyag-darsana, the second with samyag-jñāna, the third with the anu-vratas and guna-vratas, the fourth with the siksa-vratas, and the fifth with sallekhanā and the pratimās. Like Umāsvāmin Samantabhadra has been responsible for many innovations in the sravakacara doctrine and, to an even greater extent, he has rationalized the aticaras of the vratas and given them a more universal content. Even the change in the designation of the last vrata (vaivavrttva for atithi-samvibhaga) is an indication of his attitude. Many of his alterations have been rejected by almost all his successors but this notwithstanding. his influence has been far-reaching and whenever the term Svāmi is used alone it is to Samantabhadra that reference is made.

Many legends attach to his life but little can be said of it with certainty. He would seem to have been a native of the Tamil land and to have belonged to a ksatriva family.1 It seems difficult to assert with Hiralal Jain that the Ratna-karanda is based on the Tattvārtha-sūtra, the Dvādaśānupreksā, and the Daršana-prābhrta of Kundakunda 2 at the most it may be stated that in the development of the śrāvakācāra doctrine it would seem to be posterior to Kärttikeya's work, Widely differing figures are given for Samantabhadra's date. An ancient tradition puts him as early as the second century.3 equally it has been conjectured that he flourished in the first half of the eighth century4 which would seem to be too late a date, if only because of the extreme veneration with which he was regarded already in Jinasena's time. Mukhtar, after an exhaustive study of all available evidence, would go no further than to suggest somewhere between the first and fifth centuries A.D.5 Arbitrarily the present writer has accepted the upper limit-circa A.D. 450-as a probable date.

PÜLYAPÄDA

One of the oldest and probably the most authoritative of the commentaries on the Tattvartha-sutra is Pujyapada's Sarvartha-

RK · prākkathan, pp. 4-15. <sup>2</sup> Sr (V): prastāvanā, p. 45. 3 RK. prākkathan, p. 115.

<sup>5</sup> RK · prākkathan, p. 196

<sup>4</sup> See Winternitz, op. cit., p 580.

siddhi. Pūjyapāda, or Devanandın, who again, it seems, belonged to aouth India, was also the author of a Jannada-vyāhanaya in which, unless as is sometimes held this name is merely fictitious, mention is made of Samantabhadra, who must therefore be anterior to him in date. On the faith of epigraphical evidence Mukhtār would place Pūjyapāda in the second half of the fifth century, and this view is accepted by the editor of the Sawārātha-uddhi. Winternitz assumed that he lived before Samantabhadra and placed him between the fifth and the seventh centures.

There is in existence also a śrāvakācāra ascribed to Pūjyapāda.

THE RATNA-SÄRA

Many doubts exist on the authenticity of the attribution of this work to Kundakunda and both Schubring<sup>4</sup> and Jugalikson Mukhāri<sup>4</sup> have expressed the opinion that the text in its present form cannot be as old as that. This little Prakrit verse tract on the ratina-traya contains at least one verse—that which refers to the fifty-three kriyāx—of considerable interest for the development of the 'rāvakā-cāra.

JINASENA

The Mahā-punāṇa, one of the most ambitious productions of Digambara Jainism, is composed of the Adi-punāṇa and the Uttara-punāṇa. The first forty-two parvams of the former were written by Jinasena, whose guru was Virasena of the Sena Sangha, and the rest of the work was completed by his pupil Gunabhadra. Both enjoyed the patronage of the Rāṣṭrakūṭa kings and the date of termination of this epic—h.D. 8g7—has been recorded. Like the Mahā-bhārata, which it was designed to rvial, it includes many digressions of an edifying character and parvans 38, 39, and 40 are often regarded as constituting a śrāvahācāra in their own right. They are mainly devoted to a description of the fifty-three kryūš or ceremonies which mark the stages in a man's life both as layman and ascette and furnish the only extant description of these

- 1 Mukhtar, op cit., pp. 150-3.
- * Phülcsndra Siddhänta Šastri in T (P) Prastāvanā, pp 94-96
- Winternitz, op cit, p 478.
- * Schubring, Kundakunda echt und unecht, p 568
- 5 Mukhtar, op. cst , p 15
- Winternitz, op. cit, pp 497-9 which can pretend to any antiquity. Jinasena's views have been held in especial reverence by all succeeding Digambara writers.<sup>1</sup>

SOMADEVA

The Yasas-tılaka of Somadeva is in fact a campū, a romance partly in verse, partly in prose, written in oco at Gangadhara near the modern Dharwar in the territory of the Rastrakūta kings.2 Little is known of the author's life except that he belonged to the Deva Sangha, and his influence on later writers apart from Aśadhara is not very marked. The narrative of the Yaśas-tilaka does not run through the whole work: the sixth, seventh, and eighth books together constitute an excursus on the śrāvakācāra which is often referred to as Somadeva's Upāsakādhyāyana. This covers samvaktva, the twelve vratas-for the five anu-vratas illustrative stories are given-and sallekhanā. The section dealing with the sāmāvika contains an exhaustive treatment of dhyāna, and numerous hymns and verses on the anubreksas are included. Somadeva differs from other Jama ācārvas in not adhering strictly to the figure of five aticaras for each wrata and by his often very personal contributions to the śrāvakācārā such as the introduction of the four categories of truth and falsehood or of the five classes of persons entitled to maintenance by the faithful. He is noteworthy, too, for the extent to which he is permeated by Vedantist concepts.

DEVASENA

There are good grounds for assuming, as is usually done, that the Bhāva-saṃgraha and the Dariana-sāra are by the same hand. Now the latter is clearly stated to have been written in the temple of Pārsvanātha at Dhārā in samura 1900, and since the author strongly condemns all other sects as heretical he would appear to have belonged to the Mūla Sangha. The Bhāva-saṃgraha may then be dated in the first half of the tenth century A.D.<sup>3</sup>

This work—in Prakrit verse—gives a description of the fourteen guna-sthānas. The śrāvakācāra section is contained in verses 350-

&lt;sup>1</sup> It is for this reason, doubtless, that his name has been attached to a strongly hindurzed compilation on the layman's duties known as the Trivarnācāra of Jinasena. Mukhtār has characterized this work as a blatant forgery of quite recent date. See Grantha-parikṣā, pp 46 ff.

<sup>2</sup> Handigui, p. 4.

<sup>3</sup> Mukhtar, Purātana Yama-vākva sūci, pp. 59-61.

599, which describe the fifth guna-sthāna: after a brief summary of the wratas and mila-gunas, dhyāna, pipā, and dāna are described in detail. The main emphasis is on the amassing of puŋwa and the performance of pūjā and dāna; and, as in other śrāvakātaras of a popular type, it is on the joys of the deva-loka and the bhoga-bhāmis rather than on moksa that stress is land.

THE SRAVAKA-DHARMA-DOHAKA

When he edited this anonymous Apabhramsa text Hiralal Jain,1 after eliminating Yogindradeva as a possible author, proposed its ascription to Devasena and listed a number of parallels between this work and the Bhava-samgraha. Mukhtar2 is reluctant to accept this view and it is possible that the editor himself would no longer uphold it. The passages selected for comparison offer in fact little more than recurrences of certain clichés common in Jaina writings. On the other hand the description of the various forms of pūrā and results to be achieved by each of them differs considerably in the two works. If this Apabhramsa work does not then belong to Devasena it might well be a century or so later than Hiralal Jain suggests, for its enumeration of the abhaksyas seems to be more fully developed than that of Amitagati while it appears strange that its author should be the only writer before Vasunandin to mention the two divisions of the eleventh pratima Srutasagara, in his commentary on the Sat-prabhrta, quotes eight verses from this work, which he ascribes to Laksmicandra,3

The Śrāvaka-dharma-dohaka is a compilation in some 200 Apabhramsa dohās, giving in summarized form an account of the pratimās, the mūla-gunas, the vratas, dāna, vinaya, vaiyāvrītya, and pājā.

CAMUNDARAYA

The Cāmunḍarāya who wrote the Cārītra-sāra is, according to Winternitz, distinct from the minister and general of the Gaṅga king Rācamalla (asmvat 10;32-41) at whose instance the Gommaţa-sāra was composed. This other Cāmundarāya had also, however, followed the active life of a soldier before becoming a monk but nothing more seems to be known of him.

- Doha, Bhūmikā, pp. 9-19
- Mukhtår, Purātana Jaina-vākya sūci, pp 59-61.
- Velunkar, op cit, p 394. Winternitz, op. cit, p 587.

The Caritra-sara is a work which has received less than its due: Hiralal Jain does not even mention it in his survey of the Digambara śravakacaras. It is an admirably concise exposition of both the śrāvakācāra and the yaty-ācāra (about a quarter only of the contents being devoted to the former), written in clear and elegant Sanskrit prose. The arrangement is by pratimas; and the vratas. with their aticaras and adequate explanations of these, are given under the second pratimā. For the aticaras Camundaraya follows closely Pūjyapada's commentary on the Tattvartha-sūtra, often retaining his exact wording; as a model he has evidently preferred it to Samantabhadra's Ratna-karanda though his familiarity with this work is evident from the very striking division of the papopadeia category of anartha-danda into four types, and from the listing of the bhogas, which should be avoided, into five classes. Though not mentioned by name the mula-gunas are in fact discussed after the vratas. Ratri-bhorana is held to be the sixth anuvrata. After the pratimas comes a description of the sixteen bhāvanās (for which again the author is heavily indebted to Pūivapāda) and, by way of appendix, an account of the sallekhanā ritual. Many topics normally included in a śravakacara, for example, the avasyakas, and, under the head of dhyana the anupreksas, are relegated to the vaty-ācāra section.

Căimundarâya is clearly very close to Jinasena (from whose adirama, the quotes) in his affiliations. He notes the four Jaina âiramas, the third of which, the cânaprastha, is equated with the status of the layman in the eleventh pratimā. Like Jinasena he is very open to Hindu influences and in fact quotes from the Manusmṛti.

AMITAGATI

Amitagatı, pupıl of Mādhavasena, was an ācārya of the Māthura Sangha, a branch of the Kāsthā Sangha, a Munj and Sindhul are mentioned in his works and accordingly it is suggested he belonged to the literary school of Munj-1 His Subhāṣtia-rainasundoha was composed in sanwat 1050 and his commentary on the Pāñca-sangṣṇaha in sanwat 1073 so that his srācukācāra may well be dated within the first quarter of the eleventh century A.D.

It is an extensive and comprehensive work, in Sanskrit verse, the first paracheda of which is devoted to the praise of the dharma, the second to samyaktva and its opposite, mthyātva, the third to an explanation of the seven tatreas, and the fourth to a refutation of Buddhists, nāstīkas, and other heterodox sects. The fifth pariccheda begins the irāvakāāra proper with a discussion of the māla-guṇas (this actual designation is not, however, employed), the sixth and seventh are devoted to the twelve vratas and their aticārās and to sallekhanā and the praimas, the eighth to the six āvakyakas, and the ninth, tenth, and eleventh to the topic of dāna. Pūjā and the seven vyatanas are covered in the twelfth, vmaya, vayāvatīya, and vādhyāna in the fifteenth parchedas. It is only in the case of the pūjā that the details are surprisingly exiguous. Amtagati's treatise does not seem to bear a specially close relation to any earlier work.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Manu-smrts, v. 55. <sup>3</sup> Premi, op cit., pp. 176-7.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Premi, op. cit , p. 172.

In another poem, the Subhänta-ratna-sandoha, he touched on similar subjects. The whole of paracheda XXXI of this work is devoted to the basic vows of the layman and the interdictions of the müla-gunas are covered in parachedas XX, XXI, and XXII. The Sanskrit style of both poems is characterized by a conspicuous preference for recondite grammatical forms.

AMRTACANDRA

Nothing at all is known of the life of this $acatry_a$. On the faith of a Digambara $pattārali$ quoted in Peterson's eighteenth report it had been accepted—by Nāthurām Premi¹ in his edition of the Puruiārtha-siddhy-upāya and by Winternitz'—that Amṛtacandra was alive in a.b. 90-4. Upadhye,¹ in his introduction to the Pravacanaiāra, placed him somewhere between 800 and 1100 but Nāthurām Premi¹, in a later article, suggested that his date must lie between 1000 and 1250, the upper limit being given by the year of compilation of the Sāgāra-dharmāmṛta in which he is quoted. Premī has also noted that in this commentary Amṛtacandra is twice referred to as fhakkura, a title that is usually given to the people of Rajagharana.<sup>5</sup>

In its outward form the Puruşārtha-siddhy-upāya is a śrāvakācāra like so many others: after a short introduction giving certain basic

PASU prastăvană, p. 4
 Winternitz, op cit., p. 561.
 Pravacana-săra, ed by A. N Upadhve, p. 101

Fremi, op cit, p 458. This article was originally published in the Jaina Hitaiji in 1920.

See Premi, op. cit, p. 457.

principles of Jamism it discusses the ratna-traya, the twelve vratas and sallekhanā with their aticaras, and tapas and the parisahas (from its position in the text a-ratri-bhojana would appear to be considered the sixth anu-vrata though it is not given this designation). It is in the spirit that animates it that the work differs from all others of its kind. In rather harsh verse Amrtacandra sings the praises of ahimsā with the fervour of a mystic, always stressing his theme that all the evil man can do is in some sense an expression of himsā. The only other writer who at all approaches him in this singlemindedness is Amitagati.

VASUNANDIN

Again of this author really nothing is known. Several acarvas of this name are recorded but it seems safe to say that the same man composed the Śrāvakācāra and the Pratisthā-sāra-samaraha as well as the Acara-vrtti commentary on the Mūlācara. This commentary quotes Amitagati, and for this reason and because Vasunandin himself is quoted in the Sārāra-dharmāmrta commentary Nathuram Premi1 and Jugalkisor Mukhtar2 agree in placing him somewhere between A.D. 1050 and 1200. Hiralal Jain is prepared to situate him-more precisely-in the second half of the eleventh century since his guru's guru, Nayanandin, would seem to be identical with the author of the Apabhramsa Sudarsana-carita, composed in samuat 1100.3

The Śrāvakācāra or, as it is sometimes called, Upāsakādhyāyana of Vasunandin in Prakrit verse is based on the pratima framework which allows for a description under the first pratima of the seven vvasanas and of the misfortunes of the nea in the four gatis, and, under the second pratima, of the twelve vratas. The vratas are given rather anomalously-they do not include samavika and posadhopavasa, which are treated only as pratimas-and without any indication of the aticaras. The two phases of the eleventh pratima are noted. After the pratimas follow miscellaneous topics: ratribhojana, vinava, vaivāvrttva, pūjā, and dhyāna, and the work concludes with a panegyric of the monk's life. It has been shown that Vasunandin used Devasena's Bhava-sameraha and it is probable that he was familiar with Amitagati's Śrāvakācāra.4

See Premī, op cit., p. 457.
 See Mukhtår, Purātana Jama-vākya sūci, p. 100.

See Sr (V) prastăvană, pp. 18-19 See Sr (V) prastăvană, pp. 18-19 See Sr (V) prastăvană, pp. 18-19

PADMANANDIN

The name of the author of the Dharma-rasāyana, a short verse tract in Prakrit on the four patis, is given as Padmanandin, who cannot be identical with the writer of the Śrāvakācāra. Of Jama lay doctrine it gives little more than the twelve vratas and is unusual in replacing ahimsā as the first anu-vrata by 'the non-killing of animals for eacrifice' Such a formulation is not met with in any other text surveyed here but is found in the Varanga-carita of Tatila. The Dharma-rasāvana, which may be as old as the eleventh or twelfth century (though the use of Prakrit does not necessarily imply this), has some verses on the sufferings of the jiva in hell which are written with considerable verve.

ASADHARA

The author of the Sagara-dharmamrta is a very much less shadowy figure for he has given considerable information about himself and his writings in his prasastis, and on the basis of these Nathuram Premi has reconstructed his life Born about samual 1235, he belonged to the Bagheravala jati one of the most important variva jates of Rajputana, and members of his family held appointments under the rulers of Dhara, then a considerable centre of learning, whither they had moved from Mandalgarh (Mewar) after the conquest of Delhi by Shihab al-Din Ghori in samuat 1240. He subsequently lived for thirty-five years at Nälachä. Though later writers sometimes call him surz, he remained. according to Premi till his death-he was still alive and writing in samual 1300-a layman (perhaps at its close a ksullaka).2 In the course of a life devoted, it would seem, to the promotion of his religion,3 he did not hesitate to criticize and admonish the monks. as witness the verse 4

> pandıtair bhraşta-caritrair batharais ca tapo-dhanaih šāsanam jīna-candrasya nīrmalam malīnī-krtam

Āśādhara's erudition is remarkable, perhaps as comprehensive as that of the Kalı-kāla-sarvajña: he lacked only Hemacandra's capacity to present his rich material in clear and orderly fashion. Yet, more than any other writer considered here, he possessed the Varānga-carita, xv. 106. <sup>2</sup> Premī, op. cat., pp. 130-1. 1 Jina-dharmodayartham yo Nalakacchapure 'vasat is the phrase used in the prajasti 4 Premi, op cit , p 131.

temperament and habits of a scholar. Wherever he has discerned differences of opinion between the activate of old he has noted whatever he felt to be of importance, carefully indicating his sources. Thus he cites Samantabhadra ('the Svāmi'), 'linasera, Cāmundarāya, Somadeva, Amutagati, Amṛtacandra, and Vasunandin, often affording, as we have seen, valuable indications for dating them. But he did not confine himself to Digambara sources; in fact on many points, particularly on the attacars of the evatas, he transcribed whole passages from the Yoga-Sattra-2 Hemacandra is not mentioned by name but the phrase 'Stāmbarācārya'' nearly always refers to him

In this readiness to use Svetāmbara writings he may have been showing the same catholicity of outlook that in a later age animated Yasovijava in his attempts to reconcile the two sects; but it cannot be left out of account that, although he belonged to the Mula Sangha, he may also have been the inheritor of a Yapaniya tradition. Amongst his surviving works there is a commentary on the Bhagavati Ārādhanā, which, as Premī+ has shown, may well have been a Yapaniya production (its most important commentator certainly belonged to that sect) It is particularly in the section on sallekhana, to which Aśadhara attaches a quite special importance, that the influence of the Bhasavati Ārādhanā on the Sāsāra-dharmāmrta is apparent. Many of the topics discussed in this work figure in no other Digambara irāvakācāra save that of Medhāvin, who, as we shall see, belonged to the same sampradaya, the mention of sthulahimsā and sūksma-himsā, the distinction of aticara and bhanga; the tabulation of the aticaias of the brahma-vrata that may be committed by women, the catalogue of the fifteen forbidden callings: the notation of the kumāri-go-bhū classification of satva; the reference to the harming of vāyu-kāyas and ap-kāyas under anarthadanda: and the description of the dina-carva, the ideal daily round for the layman. All these have their analogies in the generality of Svetämbara works, and though some may be direct borrowings from Hemacandra-the dina-carva is a case in point-others may stem from an earlier tradition. More significant from the angle of possible Yapaniya affiliations is the description of the rite of sallekhanā when performed by women for whom nudity is then authorized.5

SDhA w 64
 See Appendix.
 SDhA v 23.
 Premi, op cit., pp. 31-32.
 SDhA viii. 38

The list of Kāsāchara's works as given by him in his praisatti is a long one but many of those mentioned seem to have disappeared completely. Apart from some short kāryas and a number of commentaries they include writings on logic, on ayurvedic medicine, on the technique of yoga, and on various elements of the Jaina ritual such as the pigā.¹ But the most important extant works are the Sāgāra-dharmāmrta and Anāgāra-dharmāmrta, which are conceived on exactly parallel lines and together form a complete manual of the secular and the monastic life. The metrical text is amplified by a prose commentary which in both cases bears the name Bhavya-kumuda-candrikā.

The Sagara-dharmamrta, which alone concerns us here, was completed in samuat 1296 and its commentary three years later. The plan of the work rests on the division into the three stages through which the śrāvaka should pursue his spiritual progress · pāksika, naisthika, and sadhaka. The first two adhvavas are concerned with the baksika stage, the next five with the naisthika, and the last with the sādhaka. The first adhyāya is taken up with a consideration of samvaktva and with definitions of a number of terms, mentioning incidentally the sravaka-gunas. The second lists the mula-gunas (noting the divergent interpretations of other ācāryas) and then deals in detail with bijia and dana (including marriage, which is regarded as kanyā-dāna). As is made clear later these terms have a different meaning for the pāksika and for the naisthika. With the third adhyāya begins the consideration of the pratimās, and this chapter is in fact taken up by a condemnation of the seven rvasanas and ancillary vvasanas, which must be eschewed before the first pratimā is attained. The next two adhvāvas cover the twelve gratas and their aticaras, the sixth is devoted to the dina-carva, and the seventh delineates the remaining pratimas, culminating in the final stage with its divisions into ksullaka and ailaka. The last adhyāya prescribes how the sadhaka is to terminate his earthly existence by the rite of sallekhanā.

MACHANANDIN

This ācārya, pupil of Kumudacandra, was the author of a Śrāvakācāra in Sanskrit and of other works in Kannada: he belongs to circa A.D. 1260.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See Premi, op cit., pp. 134-7

<sup>2</sup> Premī, Introduction to Siddhanta-sārādi-samgraha, p. 23 This Śrāvakācāra does not appear to have been published.

GUNABHŪSANA

The date of this author is very uncertain. The upper limit is urnished by the date of the manuscript on which the printed edition of the work is based—sameat 1526. At the same time he must be at least later than Vasunandin for, as Hiralal Jainhas shown, very many of his verses are no more than paraphrases of the Prakiti gaihās of Vasunandin's text. The editor of the Gunabhāṣaṇa-irāvahācāra hazards a conjecture that it may have been written in the fourteenth-century sameat. In view of its indebtedness to Vasunandin the importance of this work is not very great.

PADMANANDIN

The author of the Dharma-rasāyana is distinct from the Padmanandin to whom a brief metrical Śrāvokācāra in Sanskrit is ascribed. The contents of this latter work suggest that is notlikely to be later than the fourteenth or fifteenth century.

VAMADEVA

Vāmadeva, pupıl of Lakşmicandra of the Mūla Sangha and a kāyastha by caste, is the author of the Bhāva-samgraha, a Sanskrit metrical treatise covering the same themes as Devasena's work of the same name. He quotes from the Jina-samhitā, so that if this is the Jina-samhitā of Eksasndhi, who belongs to the fourteenthecentury samvat, he must be later than A.D. 1350.<sup>3</sup>

The lay doctrine is covered in verses 441-619, which deal with the fifth guṇa-sihāna. The topics treated include the pratimāt, the māla-guṇas, the vratas, pājā, dāna and, very summarily, the āra-yakas. Nāthurām Premi, in his introduction to the text, is perhaps rather unjust to the author whose work he characterizes as a mere paraphrase of Devasena, when in fact it contains many original elements.

SAKALAKIRTI

The Dharma-prasnottara or Prasnottara-śrāvakācāra of Sakala-kirti is an extremely voluminous verse śrāvakācāra treatise in twenty-four sargas in the form of question and answer. It is a

- 1 Prastāvanā, p 3.
- * He records these parallels in the footnotes to his edition of the Sr (V).
- BhS (V) Bhūmikā, p 7.

humdrum composition mainly consisting of longwinded narratives: for the details of the vratas the author slavishly follows Samanta-bhadra.

Sakalakirti is supposed to have died in A.D. 1464' but, to judge from style and contents, a date considerably later might more easily have been conjectured. Winternitz, however, accepts the ascription of this śrāvakācāra to the fifteenth century.

MEDHAVIN

The author of the Dharma-tamgraha-śrāvakācāra tells us m his prataitt that Panţhta Miha, a ksullaka hiving at Hisarapura and a pupil of Jinacandra Muni, commenced this work during the reign of Firûz Khān of Nagpur and that he, Medhāvin, also a native of Hisarapura, completed it in sametat 1501, basing it on the writings of Samantabhatar, Vasunandin, and Āsādhara. It ruight have been better had he dwelt more on his debt to Āsādhara, to whose sampradāya he evidently belongs, for many of the Śvetāmbara features, such as the kumār-je-o-hir classification and the picture of the dma-caryā, not found in other Digambara works reappear in Medhāvin and his treatment of sallekāmā is exactly parallel.

The Dharma-tangraha, which, according to the author, contains exactly 1,440 verses, is divided into ten adhibāras, the first three of which describe the Jina's samavasarana. These have been published separately under the title of the Samavasarana-darapana. The rest of the work follows exactly the arrangement of the Sāgāra-dharmāmrta and differs from it only in certain passages that reflect increasing hunduration such as the differentiation of touchable and untouchable iādrart or new external influences such as the passage in which the author is concerned to justify the worship of images.

BRAHMANEMIDATTA

A Dharma-pīyūṣa-śrāvakācāra6 in four adhyāyas was composed by Brahmanemidatta, who also wrote a Śripāla-carıta (A.D. 1528) and an Ārādhanā-kathā-kośa (1530).7

- <sup>2</sup> Winternitz, op. cit., p 592 <sup>2</sup> Sr (M), pp 327-8.
- 3 Schubring, Die Lehre der Jamas, p 210
- Sr (M) x 233
  Sh (M) x 233
  Sh (M) x 233
  This work was not accessible to me and in fact does not seem to have been published
  Winternitz, op cit, p 544

RAIAMALLA

The Lāti-saṃhtaī, a Sanskrtt verse treatise on isrānokācāra written by Rājamalla Kavi at Varrāt, which was part of the Mogul empire, in saṃnota 1641, opens with a panegyric of Akbar and his dynasty. In seven saṃgas it treats the mīsla-gunas, saṃyaktva, the pratimās, nad the variats, the last-named being defined by quotations from the Tattoārtha-sātra. It is important in the Digambara tradition as the first work to use the terms alaka and kaulkaba' in their modern sense and to treat of the bhoga-patm and dharma-natui.

SIVAKOTI

The Ratna-mālā of Śivakoji is a short verse tract on śrāvakūčāra of little importance and only noticed here because its author has sometimes been confused with the author of the Bhagavatī Aiādhanā. Premīj suggests that it is modern; it may belong to the seventeenth century

SOMASENA

The Tranvamihāa'ara, an extensive Sanskrit metrical treatise in hirteen adhrāyas, composed by Somasena in A.D. 1610, is of particular interest for its picture of a very hinduized Jaina community in the Kannada country in the early seventeenth century. It advocates many practices which in Jugalkiśor Mukhtär's definition are contrary to Jainism. In scope it goes very much beyond the limits of other śrāruhākāras and contains a considerable amount of information on the Iaina law of personal status.§

- Siddhānta-sārādi-samgraha mvedan, pp 22-23.
   See Mukhtūr, Grantha-pariksā, pp 98 ff.
- See Watshar, Oranna-pariest, pp 96 h.
  Extracts from it were published by Champat Ray Jain in Jaina Law, Arrah, 1916.

THE RATNA-TRAYA

THE Jaina religion, the dharma, which leads to release from the cycle of transmigration, is made up of right belief (samyag-drsti, samvaktva), right knowledge (samvag-1ñāna), and right conduct (samvak-cārītra), which together constitute the ratna-traya or three gems, I sometimes also called the gung-trava.

As samyag-drstt implies faith in the dogmas of the religion and samvag-iñāna accurate knowledge of those dogmas, many writers, especially among the Digambaras, have found it desirable to preface to their śrāvakācāras a more or less extensive summary of Jaina doctrine, particularly of the nature of tiva and harman. Thus, for example, Somadeva,2 Amitagati,3 and Vasunandin4 commence their treatises by a discussion of the seven tatte as or padarthas, the basic subjects of belief. More thoroughly treated in other works, these may be left out of account here as of no direct relevance to the practical aspects of the śrāvakācāra, but a few categories to which reference is frequently made in the exposition of the wratas are worth listing:

Thus there are nine 'matrices of the doctrine' (pravacana-mātr), consisting of three forms of self-control (pupti)

- (1) curbing of activity of speech (vag-gupts),
- (2) curbing of activity of body (kāva-pupti);
- (3) curbing of activity of mind (mano-gupts).
- and five rules of conduct (samiti).
  - care in walking (îrvā-samıtı). (2) care in speaking (bhāsā-samiti).
  - (3) care in accepting alms (esana-samiti);

  - (4) care in taking up and setting down (adana-niksena-samiti):
  - (5) care in excreting (utsarga-samiti).

Of the many complex and sometimes highly artificial divisions conceived for the category of jiva, two are commonly used:

The six jiva-mkāyas (the first five of which are collectively styled sthāvara-jīvas) are

- (1) earth bodies (prthvi-kāya);
- (2) water bodies (ap-kāya);
- (3) fire bodies (tejah-kāya);
- (4) wind bodies (vāyu-kāya);
- (5) plant bodies (vanaspati-kāya) which may be either sādhāraṇa or pratyeka,
- (6) bodies with the power of movement (trasa-kāya).

The nine jivas are.

- (1) with one sense organ (ekendriva prthvi-kava):
- (2) ., ., (ekendriya ap-kāya);
- (3) ,, ,, (ekendriya tejah-kāya);
- (4) ,, ,, ,, (ekendriya väyu-käya);
- (5) ,, ,, (ekendriya vanaspati-kāya);
- (6) with two sense organs (dvindriya);
- (7) with three sense organs (trindriya);(8) with four sense organs (caturindriva);
  - (a) with four sense organs (caturinariya).(b) with five sense organs (pañcendriva).

There are four passions (kasava)

- (1) anger (krodha),
- (2) pride (māna),
- (3) deceit (māyā);
- (4) greed (lobha);

and nine quasi-passions (akasaya, no-kasaya):

- (1) laughter (hãsya),
- (2) liking (rati);
- (3) disliking (arati);
- (4) sorrow (soka);
  (5) fear (bhava);
- (6) disgust (jugupsā);
- (7) male sex urge (pum-veda),
- (8) female sex urge (stri-veda);
- (9) androgyne sex urge (napuṃsaka-veda).

Most of these recur again in the category of the pāpa-sthānas or occasions of sin.

On the road to liberation from karman fourteen stages or gunasthānas are counted of which the fifth is that of the Jaina layman. This deśa-virati-guna-sthāna sometimes gives occasion, in works devoted to the guna-sthānas, for an exposition of the śravakācāra.

For the Digambaras śrāvakācāra belongs to a division of their substitute canon or catur-veda which they term carananuyoga covering works on moral conduct and religious duties. Such treatises are therefore mainly concerned with the third ratna. samyag-cāritra. This varies according to whether it applies to the monastic life (vaty-ācāra) or the lay life (śrāvakācāra). Amrtacandra 1 characterizes the former as the complete, and the latter as the partial, abstinence from himsā. The lay life represents, in effect, a compromise expressed originally in the imposition of twelve vratas defining the householder's samyag-caritra, and for each of these the Upāsaka-dašāh cited five typical offences

Samvaktva has in a sense, by the Svetambaras as well as by the Digambaras, been assimilated to the status of a grata and fitted with an apparatus of five infractions or aticaras which, absent from the canon, are found enumerated at least as early as the Tativarthasūtra; and in fact a discussion of samvaktva comes to be an essential element of any work devoted to the lay life.

The word dharma is interpreted 'as that which puts the soul in the place of salvation' (ātmānam mukti-sthāne dhatte) or 'that which sustains beings in the cycle of transmigration' (samsāra-sthāne prāmno dharate) 3 There are two dharmas or rules of conduct, one applicable to the monk's and the other to the layman's life 'The latter is defined by Camundarava4 as the successive attainment of the eleven pratimas

The Tattvārtha-sūtras had laid down the monk's dharma to consist of ten elements, in the main, abstract virtues:

- forbearance (ksamā);
- (2) humility (mārdava).
- (3) uprightness (ārjava),
- (4) desirelessness (sauca). (5) truthfulness (satya),
- (6) self-discipline (samyama):
- (7) self-mortification (tapas);
- PASU 40 2 T (P) vii. 23. 4 RK 1. 3. T (S) ix. 7. See Schubring, Die Lehre der Jamas, pp. 192-3.

- (8) renunciation (tyāga);
- (q) poverty (ākiñcanya),
- (10) celibacy (brahmacarya).
- The elements of this tenfold ascetic dharma are sometimes transferred, not always appropriately, to the lay life; but more generally the layman's dharma is said to consist of four elements:<sup>2</sup>
  - (1) almsgiving (dāna);
  - (2) virtue (sīla);
  - (3) ascetic practices (tapas);
  - (4) spiritual attitude (bhāva).

The word sila is often ambiguous: here it would seem to mean the maintenance of all the viralas. There is a slight variation in the four elements of dharma as defined by Aśādhara.

- (1) dāna;
- (2) śila.
- (3) upacāsa (this is equivalent to tapas, which in practice means 'fasting');
- (4) pūjā.
  - e g Padmanandi-írāvakācāra, 59
     e g. ÅU vi. 3.
     Śr (A) xii. 41
     SDhA vii. 39

CATEGORIES OF SRĀVAKAS

VABIOUS etymologies are given for this, the commonest term used to designate a layman. The śrāvaka is one who listens (śrp.oft), or one who has recourse to faith (śraddhātutām śrāth), or one whose sins flow away from him (śravanti yasya pāpām.).¹ With the nāma, sthāpanā, dravya, bhāva category we find-².

- (i) nāma-śrāvaka—one who is a Jaina in name only, just as a poor slave may bear the appellation of a god,
- (ii) sthāpanā-śrāvaka—the statue of a layman,
- (iii) dravya-śrāvaka—one who carries out the rites obligatory for a Jaina but who is empty of spirituality.
- (iv) bhāva-śrāvaka-a believing Jaina.

Amongst the Digambaras Cāmuṇḍarāya³ has taken over the Hindu concept of the four āśramas, which, following Jinasena,4 he terms brahmacārin, grhastha, vānaprastha, and bhihsu

- 1. The brahmacarın may be,5
- upanaya-brahmacārın—the young student who after the upanayana ceremony studies the āgama before entry into the household life,
- (11) avalamba-brahmacārın—one who passes a novitiate as a monk studying the āgama in the ksullaka stage but then goes back to the household life;
- (in) adiksā-brahmacārın—one who studies the āgama without taking orders or wearing the monk's garb, but adheres to the household life;
- (iv) gadha-brahmacārın—one who becomes a boy aseetic (kumāra-śramana) but later abandons this higher ideal for the household life either of his own voltion or owing to pressure from a ruler or from relatives or because of parişaha;
  - (v) nau;thika-brahmacārın—a man who begs his food, wears a red or white loincloth and the sacred thread on his chest, and has his hair shaven save for a top-knot.
    - <sup>1</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 33b. <sup>2</sup> DhRP 32. <sup>3</sup> CS, p. 20. <sup>4</sup> MP xxxix 152 <sup>5</sup> CS, pp. 20-21.

All of these are pledged to continence but all save the last (who is what in later times is called a ksullaka, a layman in the eleventh pratimā) may later marry.

- 2. The prhastha may belong to the:1
  - (1) jāti-ksatriya-i.e. brahmins, ksatriyas, vaišyas, and śūdras;
- (11) tirtha-ksatriva-who are of various kinds according to the way of their life.
- 2. The vanaprastha2 is one who has not taken the vow of nudity but wears one piece of cloth and engages in moderate asceticism. (This would perhaps correspond to the ailaka layman of later times.)
  - 4. The bhiksu may be:2
    - (1) anagāra-an ordinary monk:
    - (ii) vati-a monk who has already begun to ascend the spiritual ladder:
  - (iii) muni-a monk who possesses supernatural knowledge (avadhi-, manah-paryaya-, and kevala-iñāna);
  - (iv) ry-a monk who has attained to divine powers (rddhi).

According to Medhavin (fifteenth century) the vanaprastha—here equivalent to a ksullaka-is also styled apavada-lingin and the bhiksu utsarga-lingin.3

These classifications cannot be taken to be representative of any works except those of the school of Imasena and the definitions of terms like munt have no relevance in a normal laina context. Even the word bhiksu4 is commonly used by the Digambaras to describe a layman in the eleventh pratima: but some Svetambaras employ it as a designation for an ordinary Jaina monks whilst for others again it means a Buddhist,6 as opposed to a Jaina, ascetic.

Some Digambaras, Asadhara, and Medhavin, for example, have a threefold division of the sravaka and on this their expositions of the doctrine are based:

- (i) pāksika—a layman who has an inclination (paksa) towards alumsā. He possesses samyaktva and practises the mūlagunas and the anu-vratas and is assiduous in performing the pūjā;
- <sup>1</sup> CS, p. 21. <sup>3</sup> Sr (M) 1x. 280.
- e g Haribhadra Yākınī-putra
- 7 SDhA i. 10-20.
- <sup>2</sup> CS, p. 22.
- 4 e.g. by Somadeva.
- 6 e.g. in the commentary of DhRP 21. 8 Sr (M) v. 1-8.

- (ii) naişlnikai—one who pursues his path upwards through the pratimās till he reaches the eleventh. At this culminating point (nsphā) he quits the household life and practises the tenfold dharma of the ascetic. It would seem that if he backslides he is down-graded to the state of a naksika.
- (iii) sādhaka—one who concludes (sādhayati) his human incarnation in a final purification of the self by carrying out sallekhanā.

Aśādhara, who repeats Cāmunḍarāya's categories of brahmacārīnīs and the list of the four āśramas, also gives a classification of the śrāvaka based on his progress through the pratimās:4

- (i) least satisfactory (jaghanya)-first to sixth pratimās-grhin;
- (ii) next best (madhyama)—seventh to ninth pratimās—varnin,
- (iii) best (uttama or utkṛṣṭa)—tenth and eleventh pratimās bluksuka

This is based on a similar grouping by Somadeva, who calls the varnin a brahmacārin

Is in fact equivalent to a nasşinka-brahmacārin and to what is later called a kşullaka 2 SDhA iii 4 3 SDhA vii 19-20.
4 SDhA iii 2-3

CATEGORIES OF FOOD

THE descriptions of the posadhopavāsa and of the forms of pratyā-khyāna are not intelligible without an explanation of the classifications of what may be eaten or drunk. Prohibited foods (abhakṣyas) are discussed separately elsewhere.

In the first place there are the fourfold aliments (caturvidhāhāra):1

- aiana—all that is swallowed: grains and pulses of all knds, particularly the staple, boiled rice. Forbidden foods falling under this head include meat and the tuberous vegetables, which are condemned as amanta-kāyas. Dairy products are also sometimes covered by this designation.
- 2. pāna—all that us drunk: water, milk, the juuce of fruits such as grapes and tamarınds, and the water in which rice or barley other cereals have been boiled, particularly rice-gruel (kāñjiha or saucira). Prohibited under this head are alcohol and the liquid from meat.
- 3. khādima—all that is chewed or nibbled: fruits and nuts such as mangoes, dates, almonds and coconuts, darry products, sugar and molasses, and various cakes and sweetmeats. Abhaksyas coming into this category include honey and the udumbara fruits.
- 4. svädmna—all that is tasted or serves as a relish: pepper, cumin seeds, myrobalans, ginger, herbs such as basil, and betel. Sugar-cane, molasses, and honey are also sometimes put into this category. More surprisingly toothpicks (dantavana) are covered by this desuparation.

There is another classification of food—or rather of certain articles of food—into ten vikrtis:2

- kṣira--milk, which may be of five kinds according to whether it comes from the cow, buffalo, goat, sheep, or camel;
- (2) dadhi-curds
- (3) navanita—butter these may be from cow's, buffalo's, goat's or sheep's milk, but not from camel's milk:
  - <sup>1</sup> Sr (A) vs. 96, 97; PS 207, 211 <sup>2</sup> YS ui. 130 (pp. 707-8); PS 217-21.

- (5) taila—oil, which may be of four kinds: sesamum, flax (atari), mustard, and saffron (kusumbha). Other oils are not for consumption as food but are used for preparing plaster or for sticking.
- (6) puda—molasses:
  - (7) madya—alcohol, which may be of two kinds: from sugarcane juice or from the fermentation of grain;
- (8) madhu—honey, which may be of three kinds; made by bees (bhrāmara), by files (maksikā), or by kuttya,¹
- (9) māmsa—meat, which again is said to be of three kinds: of birds, beasts or fishes; sometimes, however, this threefold division is explained as skin, meat, and blood.
- (10) avagāhma—the term is difficult to translate: it is the product which results from cooking rice in a pain filled with ghee or oil; after the third cooking in the oil there is no further production of avagāhima and the rice cooked will be iirvakrika.

Food is also distinguished by four flavours or rasas 2

- (1) go-rasa-milk flavour comprising ghec, butter, and curds;
- (2) tksu-rasa—sugar flavour including molasses and honey,
- (3) phala-rasa-fruit flavour covering fruits such as mangoes,
- (4) dhānya-rasa—cereal flavour comprising oil and rice-gruel.

  The essential idea of a subrit seems to be that of a foodstriff that has changed its nature owing to a process of cooking or to bacteriological action. In the conventional interpretation of the commentators it is 'that by which tongue and mind are perverted,'2

The expression ācāmāmlā deserves a special mention. This is a sanskrittzation of the Prakrit which is also rendered as āyāmāmla and ācāmla. It consists of grain or pulses cooked only in water with a sour flavouring (āmla-raṣa).

 $<sup>^1</sup>$  No satisfactory explanation of this word (the enumeration goes back to the  $Sth\bar{a}m\bar{a}nga$ -stirra) secure to have been given  $^2$  SDhA v 3c.

SAMVAKTVA AND MITHYATVA

Samvaktva or samvagdrsti, in the translation generally used; 'right belief', is defined by Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāya as 'faith in the path to final liberation indicated by the Jina'. Other Digambaras such as Samantabhadra, Somadeva, and Vasunandın describe it with greater precision as faith in the three articles of belief:2 ātta (the lina), āgama (the scriptures), and pudārtha or tattva (the dogmas). Others again prefer to visualize it from the negative angle as the absence of twenty-five blemishes (drg-dosas) generally held to be the eight madas, the three mudhatas, the six anayatanas, and the eight dosas. These blemishes are carried to a higher total in some works such as the Ratnasāra, which adds to the above list the seven bhavas or types of fear, the five attearas, and the seven vices or evasanas. For the Svetambaras from the Pañcāśakas3 onwards samyaktva means faith in the truths enunciated by the Tirthankara. Hemacandra4 calls it 'faith in the right deva, the right guru, and the right dharma'.

The subject of samyaktva is too vast and too imprecise to lend itself readily to numerical categorization and there is considerable confusion and overlapping in the lists of qualities and defects conceived to describe it. Here are some of the categories used by different dearyae, Digambara and Svetambara.

Linga	Guna	Bhūsana .	Anga	Dosa	Atıcāra
samvega šama nirveda āstikya	samvega upašama nirveda bhakti	kauśala tīrtha-sevā		kűnkşű vicikitsű	šanka kānksā vicikitsā para-pāsandi-
anukampā	anukampā	prabhāvanā	prabhāvanā	aprabhävanä	prašamsā para-pāşandı- samstava
	nındā garhā vātsalya		sthiti-karana	anupagühana asthiti-karana avätsalya

Of these categories, linga and bhūsaṇa belong to Hemacandra, the former being known also to Āśādhara and the latter to Devagupta though not under those names: aṅga, doṣa, and guṇa seem to be purely Digambara concepts, the first named being common to almost all the writers in the field; whilst the atternar ranged symmetrically alongsed those of the wratas are given in nearly all the texts Digambara and Svetāmbara. The dosas are of course merely the negations of the arigas. It will be convenient to treat first the category guar.

$$^{1}$$
 CS, p. 2.  $^{2}$  Śr (V) 4.  $^{3}$  P (Śr Dh) 3.  $^{4}$  YŚ 11. 2. C 787

- (i) Spiritual craving (tamwega). Pājyapāda¹ has defined this as the ever-present fear of the cycle of transmigration. Hemcandra² characterizes it more positively as the desire for mokwa arising from the realization that the pleasures of gods and men are, in the last resort, unsatisfying, Amtagati² calls it unwavering attachment to deva, guru, and dharma. For Āšādhara² it is fear of the unstable samāra which brings sickness and sorrow and sudden calamity.
  - (ii) Tranquillity (śama, upaśama). This is taken to imply the stilling of the kasāyas.<sup>5</sup>
- (ui) Disgust (nirveda). This is the loathing induced in a man of right faith by contact with the world and its miseries: he will have known the world and found it evil. But, continues Hemacandra, of others hold sameega to mean disgust with mundane existence and nirveda desire for final release. Amitagait? understands by nirveda the distaste for sensual pleasures.
- (iv) Devotion (bhakti). By Hemacandra this is placed among the five bhūsanas of samyaktiva and is best considered there. Amitagati<sup>8</sup> understands by it 'devotion to Jina and guru'.
- (v) Compassion (anukampā). This Hemacandra'v defines as the desire to eliminate suffering, in this compassion for those in missery no partiality may be shown, for even a tiger will manifest affection for its own offspring. In its material aspect this virtue takes the form of practical steps to remedy suffering where one has the power and in its non-material aspect it expresses itself in tenderness of heart. It is, as Āśādhara¹v stresses, the root of the whole sacred doctrine.
- (vi) Remorse (mndā). This is the remorse felt by a pious man when for the sake of wife or son or brother or friend he has committed some act inspired by passion or hate.<sup>11</sup>
  - (vii) Repentance (garhā). This is the repentance expressed in

```
1 T (P) vh. 12 2 Y S ii 15 (p. 181), 3 Sr (A) ii. 74

4 SDhA i. 4. 5 Y S ii. 15 (p. 180). 6 Ibid. (p. 182)

7 Sr (A) ii 75. 8 Ibid. 79. 9 Y S ii 15 (p. 182)

10 SDhA i. 4 ii Sr (A) ii 76
```

the form of ālocanā made in the presence of a guru for faults committed under the influence of passion and hate. The interpretation of this as of the preceding guna depends on Amitagati as the other ācāryas do not explain these terms.

(viii) Loving kindness (vātsalya) This belongs also to the category of the angas.

The above eight gunas are listed by Cāmunḍarāya, Amitagati, and Hemacandra lists five lingas<sup>2</sup> of samyaktva, four of which find a place also in the Digambara category of gumas. The remaining element āstikya is explained as the acceptance of the Jaina doctrine as the veritable creed even in the presence of other opinions.

'The angas of samyaktva are noted by Pūjyapāda, Samantabhadra, Cāmundarāya, Somadeva, and Amṛtacandra.

- (i) Freedom from fear (mthianka). This meaning is preferred by Samantabhadra, who sees in it a determination 'rigid as the temper of steel' to follow the path of righteousness, and by Camundarāya, who lists the seven types of fear (bhaya).<sup>4</sup>
  - (1) fear of this world (tha-loka);
  - (ii) fear of the next world (para-loka);
  - (iii) fear of sickness (vyādhi),(iv) fear of death (marana);
  - (v) fear of being without protection (agupti),
  - (vi) fear of being without defence (atrana),
  - (vii) fear of something unexpected (akasmika).

Amptacandra,<sup>5</sup> however, prefers to interpret mhianka as freedom from doubt about the truths proclaimed by the Jina. Somadeva<sup>6</sup> offers both explanations. doubt, in his view, would mean an inability to choose between one doctrine and another, one vow and another, and one divninty and another.

(i) Desirelessness (mhkāmkgā). For Samantabhadra? this means the absence of desire for pleasure which is finite, sinful, and attended by sorrows. Camundarāya and Amptacandra³ interpret it either as lack of craving for the enjoyment of sensual pleasures in this or in a subsequent life, or else as absence of interest in false creeds. Somadeva³ elaborates the same explanations remarking that to exchange samyaktva for the joys of the world is like bartering a ruby for buttermilk.

```
<sup>1</sup> Śr (A) <sup>11</sup> 77. <sup>2</sup> YŚ <sup>11</sup> 15. <sup>1</sup> RK <sup>1</sup> 11. <sup>1</sup> CS, p. 2. <sup>3</sup> PASU 23. <sup>6</sup> Handiqui, p. 259. <sup>7</sup> RK <sup>1</sup> 12. <sup>8</sup> PASU 14. <sup>9</sup> Handiqui, p. 259.
```

- (iii) Overcoming of repugnance (nurvacikitaā, nirjuguptā). Samantabhadra¹ holds this to imply the love of virtue without dissust for the body which is impure by nature but sanctified by the ratna-traya. For Amrtacandra¹ it means the victory over a person¹ satural repugnance for whatever is physically nauseating like excrement, or productive of discomfort like heat and cold, hunger and thirst. Cāmuṇḍarāya¹ explains this ariga as the removal of the false concept that the body is pure by comprehending the nature of its impurity, or else as the absence of the regrettable idea that such and such a doctrine of the Jaina religion is inappropriate and horirfying whilst another doctrine is in every way admirable. For Somadeva¹ nurvicikitā means that there must be no hesitation in the practice of sawānrītus.
- (iv) Unswerving orthodoxy (amūdha-drytt). This is the refusal to approve in thought, word, or deed the path of wrong belief,<sup>5</sup> in other words the rejection of mithyātra.
  - (v) Good works (prabhāvanā). This is also a bhūsana and will be dealt with as such.
- (w) Edification (upagihana, upabrmhana). Samantabhadra' defines as the removal of any reproach levelled at the Jana by gnorant people unable to follow the vows. Cāmuṇdarāya and Amṛtacandra' understand by it the development of one's religious faith by cultivating forbearance (ksamā) and the other nine elements of dharma. At the same time faults committed by co-religionists should, as far a lies within one's power, be concaelad, ra's a mother conceals the failings of her children', a' But the Jana religion will not be sullied by one unworthy adherent any more than a pool of water will be fouled by one dead frog.<sup>5</sup>
- (vii) Strengthening in the faith (sthit-karana). Samantabhadra'd defines this as the reaffirmation in the faith, by intelligent me full of vastashy a, of those who are lapsing from right views and right conduct, whether their wavering is due to a faulty acquaintance with the creed or to external causes. This añga is virtually equivalent to the sthawya-bhisana of Hemacanda.

```
      1 RK 1 13
      2 PASU 15
      1 CS, p. 3

      4 Handiquu, p 259
      5 RK 1 14.
      6 RK 1 15.

      7 PASU 27.
      8 Handiquu, p 260.
      9 Ibid, p 261.

      10 RK 1. 16.
      10 RK 1. 16.
```

(viii) Loving kindness (vāttadya). This Samantabhadra' defines as unfeigned and wholchearted assistance to members of one's community. Cāmuṇḍarāya' calls it 'unfeigned affection for the fourfold Jaina community, like that of a cow for its calf, as a result of attachment to the sacred doctrine'. Somadeva' connects with this arigat the qualities of vaiyārṣtīya, vinaya, and bhakti. Vinaya comprises veneration for all who are deserving of respect, and bhakti devotion to the Jina, the gurus, and the scriptures. As the concept denoted by vaiyārṣtīya, or sometimes by oāttadya, is so important in the Jaina community it deserves separate consideration.

Hemacandra has listed five bhūsanas of samyaktva:

- (i) Firmness (stharrya). This means strengthening the faith of anyone who is wavering in the Jaina creed or maintaining one's own faith firmly despite the success of adherents of other religions.
- Conversancy with the Jaina doctrine (Jina-sāsane kausala).
   This bliū-ana is self-explanatory.
- (iii) Frequentation of the tirthas (tirtha-sevā). The term tirtha is to be explained either in a material sense as the places of birth, consecration, enlightenment, and nirvāṇa of the Jinas or in a transferred sense as the fourfold Jaina community.
- (iv) Devotion (bhakti). This according to Hemacandra can take two forms vinaya and vaiyāvritya. The former is expressed in an eightfold upacāra like that accorded to an atith in the ritual of dāna.
- (v) Good works (prabhāvanā). This term covers anything done to spread the Jaina fatth and increase the consideration in which it is held. For Somadeva' this may take the form of the practice of almsgiving, eclebration of festivals, setting up of images, or building of temples. The glory of the Juna's teaching, says Samantabhadra, so to be illuminated by removing the darkness of ignonance. Prabhāvanā for Amrţicandra? would be expressed in almsgiving, feats of asceticism, pijā, and study. Hemacandra's distinguishes several types of persons (prabhāvaka) who are responsible for this bhūsapa experts in the Jaina canon, reciters of religious stories, debaters, astrologers, those who practise religious asceticism, those who are learned in the sciences, and those who are conversant with magic spells.

```
<sup>1</sup> RK 1. 17. <sup>2</sup> CS, p. 3. <sup>3</sup> Handiqui, p. 262. <sup>4</sup> YŚ n. 16. <sup>5</sup> Handiqui, p. 261. <sup>6</sup> RK 1. 18 <sup>7</sup> PASU 30 <sup>8</sup> YŚ n. 16 (p. 185)
```

The aticaras of samyoktve may virtually, if the fourth and fifth of them which are closely related are merged together, be equated with the first four dosas. Both aticaras and dosas represent the negation of the angas. Pūjyapāda' holds that it is in any event unecessary to have eight aticaras corresponding to the eight angas as the fourth and fifth—para-pāsandi-praiamsā and para-pāsandi-samstava—are elastic and comprehensive. Here, first, then, are the aticaras:

- (i) Doubt (śanka). Siddhasena Ganın and Haribhadra' consider this to be doubt in respect of the padārthas of the Janna creed, this may be either partial when, for example, one padārtha is called in question, or total when the whole structure of Janna belief is chailenged. Total doubt (śarwa-uraya-śanka) is virtually the same as mithyātea. This interpretation of śanka as 'doubt' is given by all writers, Svetämbara and Digambara.
- (ii) Desire (kānhās) This again, like the preceding atrāra, will tarnish samyahtva but not eradicate it. It is generally held to imply a hankering for other doctrines than Jainism, for one particular one if it is partial and for all in general if it is total.<sup>3</sup> Such a desire may be provoked by hearing that the Buddhists, for example, put no restriction on eating and drinking or bathing or easy living I is wrong—in fact it amounts to a nidāna—to cherish such purely material desires as to be handsome, or to have many sons, or to be reborn as a king, seeing in them a recompense for adherence to the right faith.
- (m) Repulsion (wwiktas). Two interpretations of this are given by the Svetāmbaras* from Siddhasena Gaṇin onwards, either it means hesitation or doubt about the value of the results of various human activities (not about the tenets of Jainism as in the case of the first atticara); or else it means repugance for the bodies of Jainia ascetics because these are evil-smelling owing to the accumulation of fith and sweat on their unwashed limbs. What hinders them from bathing in water that has been rendered sterile, people ask, oblivious of the fact that a monk must insist on the impurity of the body.

&lt;sup>1</sup> T (P) vii 23 <sup>2</sup> YS ii 17 (p. 187). <sup>2</sup> Ibid (pp 187-8). <sup>4</sup> Ibid (p 180).

- (iv) Admiration of adherents of other creeds (para-pāṣaṇḍs-praśaṇṣā).
- (v) Praise of adherents of other creeds (pran-phagandi-samistava). The distinction between the fourth and fifth aticāras seems artificial. As has been noted they both have for antonym the aniga of amiddha-drist and in fact Somadeva' couples them together under the designation of any-alāghā or mādahatā. With that exception the Digambaras (for example, Cāmuṇdarāya) define pratamā s' praise expressed in the mind' and amitava as 'praise expressed in words'. The Svetāmbaras' interpret praiamā as 'praise' and samistava as 'acquaintance'. Siddhasena Ganin, 4 however, prefers the Digambara explanation.

For many writers these two aticāras give an occasion to describe and criticize the false beliefs of other sects—180 varieties of kriyarādins, 84 of akriya-vādins, 67 of ajīlāmikas, and 32 of vainayikas are listed—particularly the Buddhists and Saivas.<sup>5</sup>

As was mentioned at the beginning the aticaras and dosas are not the only blemishes of samyaktra. The six anāyatanas or nonabodes (sc. of right belief<sup>6</sup>) appear to be a purely Digambara category.

- false divinities (ku-deva);
   false ascetics (ku-lingin);
- (iii) false scriptures (ku-śāstras);
- (iv) worship of false divinities (ku-deva-sevā);
- (v) worship of false ascetics (ku-lingi-sevā);
- (vi) worship of false scriptures (ku-śāstra-sevā).

Together these anāyatanas amount to mthyātva—the direct opposite of samyaktva—which is defined by Hemacandra<sup>7</sup> as belief in false divinities, false gurus, and false scriptures.

For the Svetāmbaras muthyātva may be of five types:8

- ābhigrahıka—the attitude of those whose horizon is limited to their own scriptures which they are able to defend in discussion;
- (ii) anābhigralnka—the attitude of simple people who imagine that equal respect is to be shown to all gods, teachers, and creeds;
- <sup>1</sup> Handiqui, p 258. <sup>2</sup> CS, p 4. <sup>3</sup> YS 11. 17 (p. 189). <sup>4</sup> T (S) vii. 19 (p 102). <sup>5</sup> Ibid. (pp. 100-2).
- Handiqui, p 257. 7 YS ii. 3. 8 NPP 4.

- (iii) ābhiniveśika—the attitude of those who, like Jamāli, possess the faculty of discernment but deformed by some evil preconception (abhiniveśa).
  - (iv) sāmsaynka—a state of uncertainty or hesitation between various viewpoints;
  - (v) anābhogika—the innate state of false belief typical of living organisms which have not attained to a higher stage of development.

The Digambaras prefer a division into three types:1

- agrhita—an inherent, non-acquired quality found even in the lowest stages of living organisms;
- (ii) grhita—an attitude acquired, for example, by birth in a family which professes a false creed;
- (III) sāmšayika—an attitude of indecision as in the previous list.

Or else a sevenfold category.2

- (i) ekāntika—the absolute attitude as, for example, the belief that the jīva perishes;
- (ii) sāmśayıka—the attitude of uncertainty about the right faith as in the previous lists;
- (iii) vainayika—the view that all gods, gurus, and scriptures are alike,
- (iv) grhita—the attitude of acquired habit like the leatherworker's dog which gnaws hides;
- (v) viparīta—the view that what is true is false and vice versa,
- (vi) naisargika—the inherent false belief of creatures devoid of consciousness which, like a blind man, cannot discern fair from foul. This is equivalent to the agrhita of the previous list, or the anābhogika of the first list;
- (vii) mūdha-drsp—the false belief where the divinity, the guru, and the dharma are sullied by passion and violence.

This mūdha-dṛṣtu which is more properly one of the dosas of samyaktwa is presented in a more detailed form in the category of the three mūdhatār or foolish ideas relating to the divinity, to the teacher and to worldly life. These seem to be listed only by the Digambaras but Hemacandra and other Svetāmbaras find the same opportunity for criticizing the superstitions of other religions when they discuss the nature of the ku-deva, ku-guru, and ku-sāstra.

- (i) Devată-mādhatā. Ît is a misconception of the nature of the divinity, says Samantabhadra, 'to worship devas stained with passion and hate in order to obtain a boon. Hemacandra' characterizes the lu-devas or a-devas as addicted to women (symbolizing rāga), and rosarise (symbolizing moha), and accustomed to inflict punishments or grant boons. All these attributes are mappropriate to the Jina who is devoid of passion, hate, and delusion. The deties that take pleasure in dancing, music, and theatrical performances cannot offer their votaries any lasting good.<sup>3</sup> In this connexion Hemacandra delivers a long attack on Hindu religion condemning particularly the worship of the sacred row.
- (ii) Pārandi-mūdhatā. Samantabhadra' defines this as the praise of false asectics who are engaged in worldly occupations, who have not divested themselves of possessions, and who are guilty of himaā. By false gurus Hemacandra' understands those who lust atter women, gold, lands, and houses, who do not refrain from the consumption of meat, honey, alcohol, and ananta-kāyas, who do not keep vows of chastity but are attached to wives and children, and who preach false doctrines.
- (iii) Loka-midhatā. As such worldly foolishness Samantabhadra' instances the bathing in rivers or in the ocean, the making of beard of stones or sand, the throwing oneself from a precipice, and the entering into fire. Equally senseless are such customs as the use of the pañaca-garya and the adoration of trees, stones, gems, and other material objects.<sup>5</sup>

Among the twenty-five drg-dosas mentioned earlier occur the eight madas or forms of vainglory:

```
(1) pride in one's knowledge (1ñāna);
```

- (11) pride in one's worship (pūjā);
- (iii) pride of family (kula);(vi) pride of caste (iāti).
- (v) pride in one's strength (bala),

```
<sup>1</sup> RK 1. 23. <sup>2</sup> YŚ 11. 6 <sup>3</sup> YŚ 11. 7. <sup>4</sup> RK 1. 24. <sup>5</sup> YŚ 11. 9 <sup>6</sup> RK 1. 12. <sup>7</sup> YŚ 11. 102. <sup>8</sup> RK 1. 25.
```

Perhaps better translated following Jinasena (MP xxxix, 85) 'paternal ancestry' and 'maternal ancestry'

- (vi) pride in one's wealth (rddhi);
- (vii) pride in one's ascetic practices (tapas);
- (viii) pride in one's beauty (vapus).

Various classifications of samyaktoa are given particularly by the Digambara ācāryas, the most widespread being the threefold division into kṣayika, auṇatāmika, and kṣayauṇatāmika variettes which depend on the extent to which karmic matter has been removed from the isea.<sup>1</sup>

Closely associated with samyaktva is the category of the three salyas which the Digambara writers' generally define before discussing the vratas. These are the harmful stimuli or 'stugs' which distract the person who has attained to right belief:

- (1) deceit (māyā),
- (ii) hankering for worldly pleasures and fame (mdana);
- (iii) false belief (mithyātva).

And, unless he rids himself of these falyas, he cannot properly observe the eratas. The Svetämbaras do not seem to employ the term falya in this sense but Abhayadeva, in his commentary on the Upāaka-datāh, quotes a verse in which the śalyas seem to be equated with the atterāras of samyadeva.

THE MULA-GUNAS

PROBABLY no term of Janism is used to cover so many different categories as the word guna. The māla-gunas for the Śvetāmbarasimean generally the five anu-oratas (though sometimes a single māla-guṇa—ahmisā is mentioned) whilst the guṇa-vratas and siṣḥa-vratas soughter make up the uttara-gunas. The Digambaras, however, apply the name māla-guṇa* to a category of interdictions which must be respected if even the first stage on the ladder of the pratimār is to be attained. Similar concepts are not foreign to Śvetāmbara Janism but they are not displayed with the same prominence nor is the designation māla-gunae ever applied to them.

Medhavin, who speaks of the agra-pada (Sr (M) v. 4)

&lt;sup>1</sup> Handiqui, p. 255.

<sup>2</sup> UD 1. 70 (p. 26) sank-āi-salla

<sup>4</sup> YŠ ini. 130 (p. 696).

<sup>5</sup> Āšādhara opposes the mīla-gunas as a category to the agra-gunas by which he understands the twelve veatas (SDhA ini. 7-8). A similar term reappears in

The following table will show the variations that occur among Digambara writers in determining these mūla-guņas:

AMRTACANDRA	SAMANTABHADRA	JINASENA	ASADHARA
Amstagats, t Ašādhara Šrāvaka-dharma- doha, Devasrna, Medhāvin, Saka- lakīrts, Rājamalla, Somasena	Swakoti	Cămundarāya Somadeva Āsādhara
	Strakott	Asaanara
(1) (2) (3) udumbara- pañcaka- virati	anu-vrata- pañcaka	anu-vrata- pañcaka	āpta-nuti dayā jala-galana
(4) (5)			a-rātri-bhojana udumbara-pañcaka- virati
(6) mämsa-virati (7) madya-virati (8) madhu-virati	mämse-virati madva-virati madhu-virati	mämsa-virati madya-virati dyuta-virati	māmsa-virati madya-virati madhu-virati

In the sense given to the term by the Digambaras there is no canonical authority for the mūla-gunas and for this reason it is all the more important to determine which enumeration of them is likely to have been the original one. The Ratna-karanda2 is the oldest text under review to mention this category. But as has been noticed elsewhere Samantabhadra is responsible for many innovations in the si avakacara, and the same observation can be made with equal appropriateness about Jinasena. Yet it seems difficult to believe that, had Samantabhadra's version been the original one, the anu-vratas as mula-gunas would have been replaced by the udumbaras in other lists, least of all by a writer like Amrtacandra whose work is the direct antithesis of the popular śrāvakācāras. And if the anu-vrata-pañcaka wears a new look in comparison with the udumbara-pañcaka-virati linasena's version in which dvata is linked with mamsa and madva has even more unmistakably the air of having been refurbished. In this context it is perhaps not irrelevant to note that Asadhara,3 who offers

&lt;sup>1</sup> Amutagats, who does not employ the actual term  $m\bar{u}la$ -gunas, adds u ninth element a- $a\bar{q}tr$ -bhojana (Sr (A) v. 1).

<sup>1</sup> RK iii. 20

<sup>1</sup> SDhA 11 2-3

three variant enumerations of the mūla-guṇas clearly prefers that of Amrtacandra

If this last list is examined more closely the impression of us authenticity is confirmed. The apparently disparate elements—the five udumbara fruits and three forbidden cubrits* meat, alcohol, and honey—from which abstention is enjoined have one aspect in common they are all used as offerings to the spirits of the ancestors. Now of all Hindu customs that which has met with the keenest reprobation from Janism has been the custom of braddha and the offering of sacrifices to the patrs. That trāddha in an innocuous form has been accepted by Jans in modern times in a way invalidates this contention; even a work as late as Vāmadeva's Bhādas-samgraha can declare that those who proputate the patrs with meat consume their own potra. 2

The cult of the ancestors is linked, as Meyer's has shown, with the worship of fertility spirits including the Great Mother, and since the bee is beheved to incarnate the ptrs honey is used as an offering to them. Przyluski has noted the epithet. Adit madhikata's the whose whip is of honey' because honey is held to be, among all foodstuffs, that which gives the most vigour. For Amitagath, in the Subhäista-ratina-samiloha,'s the common characteristic of meat, alcohol, and honey is their aphrodistac quality. The udumbaras, perhaps because of their milky latex, have been identified with the source of all fertility, and possibly owing to the ceaseless rustling of their leaves have been regarded as homes of the spirits of the dead by

In Jama number magic there is often an interplay between the groups of five and the groups of four (and its multiples); thus the five anu-eratas are made up to a total of twelve by the addition of the guna-cratas and siksā-cratas. It may be that originally the Digambaras had inherited a tradition—a tradition, perhaps, in which the designations alone had survived—of twelve uttaragunas (which were the varias) and five (later transformed into eight) multa-gunas. For a religion, at that date essentially missionary, the

<sup>1</sup> Note, for example, YS 11. 47 for the whole argument of the Dharma-rasayana

<sup>2</sup> BhS (V) 442

Meyer, Trilogie altindischer Maihte und Feste der vegetation, Pt. 111, pp. 77 ff
 Przyluski, La Grande déesse, p. 30

Subhāṣita-ratna-samdoha, xxi 13, xxii. 18, xx. 24.
Przvluski, op cit, p 8o.

first step before a layman could assume the vratas would be for him unambiguously to reject the cult of the ancestors by a religious interduction of the offerings most commonly associated with that cult.

The udumbaras are the fruits of five trees of the genus Ficus:

- (i) umbara, udumbara-Ficus glomerata Roxb.;
- (11) vata, nyagrodha-Ficus bengalensis;
- (iii) pippala, aśvattha-Ficus religiosa Linn.;
- (iv) plaksa-Ficus infectoria Roxb.,
- (v) kakombarı, guphala-Ficus oppositifolia Willd.

In the older texts the ulumbaras are not ananta-kāyar though the streemth-entry Digambara Rājamalla' says explicitly that the word ulumbara is the symbolic representation (upalakṣaṇa) for the sādhārana plants. The reason for not eating them is that they are full of innumerable tmy insects and of invisible living organisms, the epithet krim-kalūkula which is often applied to meat being used of them.<sup>2</sup> A pious man, Hemacandra' says, should avoid them even if he is hungry and unable to obtain any other food. Sometimes the traus-tiesa are said to be present only in the most fruits but even the eating of the dried fruits is sinful because of the rāga involved.<sup>4</sup>

In the Śrāvala-dharma-pañačiaka the udumbaras are coupled with the atyaigas and the amanta-bâyas in the interdictions covered by the bhogopabhoga-evata; if the atyangas mean the ma-kāras there is here a virtual equivalence with the māla-guass but there seems to be no absolute bain on cating the udumbaras until the layman reaches the stage of the sacitta-tyāga-patimā. Similarly Suddhasena, discussing the aticāra of the bhogopabhoga-evata, cites as examples of sacitta-sambadahāhārā the consuming of jujubes or examples of sacitta-sambadahāhārā the consuming of jujubes or examples of sacitta-sambadahāhārā the consuming of jujubes or bacumbara furtus because large numbers of seeds are swallowed. By the time of Devagupta' the attitude towards the udumbara: has become clearer: the accord guada-avata is defined as lumting the use of clothes, unguents, and other items of personal expenditure and as banning the three ma-kār as (māma, madum, madya) and the five udumbara; and in Hernacandra this eighthold ban is given an Lăți-samhită, n. 79.

 This phrase, one of the commonest of all Jaina clichés, is also found in

Bhartpari's Nin-jataka

<sup>2</sup> YS ni 42-43

<sup>3</sup> T (S) vu. 30

<sup>4</sup> PASU 73.

<sup>5</sup> P (SrUP) 24.

<sup>6</sup> T (S) vu. 30

<sup>7</sup> NPP 75.

importance almost equivalent to that of the mula-guņas in Digambara texts.

The eating of meat and drinking of alcohol are also catalogued among the seven vyazanas and a confusion, deliberate or involuntary, of vyazanas and müla-guṇas is doubtless responsible for Jinasena's' mention of gambling (dyūta) and for the enumeration found in a late writer, Vāmadeva,' who obtains a figure of eight müla-guṇas by reckoning together abstention from the udumbara pentad, the ma-kāra triad, rātri-hōŋana, whoring, adultery, theft, and gambling with five-dawa' (compassion for living beings).

Meat, alcohol, honey, and butter (which too is an abhabays, though not coming under the interdictions imposed by the milaguna) are vikrits—the four harmful vikrits. The eating of meat is, above all, a sin against compassion and the guilt belongs not only to the actual slaughterer but to anybody who buys or sells, cooks or carves, or gives or eats meat as in fact the Ilindu dharma-šāirta confirm. To eat meat is to acknowledge vultures, wolves, and tigers as one's gurus. Some people, continues Hemacandra (alluding to the śrāddha), not only eat meat themselves but offer it to the devas and pitr.

The Digambaras tend to emphasize the sharp distinction between eating meat which contains trasa-jiras and fruits or corn in which there are present only thicara-jiras. Even where a bull or buffalo has not been slaughtered but has died a natural death the consumption of its flesh involves the destruction of the minute living organisms (mgodas) that have found refuge there and these continue to come into existence in meat either raw or cooked or in process of cooking so that very great himsa is caused even by touching a piece of it. The eating of meat, says Ašādhara, *necreases the lusts of the flesh and keepa a man wandering in the samašra.

While some writers tend to stress the permicious effects of alcohol in befuddling the mind of the drinker others are more concerned with the inevitable himed involved in the process of fermentation. Thus Somadeva' and Asadhara's refer to the immense number of freat transformed into a drop of alcohol and the former adds that sometimes in the cycle of transmigration beings are metamorphosed into wine to bemuse the minds of men.

Honey is condemned by Somadeva' because 'it is pressed out of the young eggs in the womb of bees and resembles the embryo in the first stage of its growth'. To provide but a single drop, says Amptacandra,' bees have to be killed and even if they have been driven by some artiface from the comb or if the honey has dripped down of tself himsā will still occur since other living creatures find their way into it. This same honey is unclean because it is derived from the vomit or spittle of insects and even though it may possess medicinal properties it will still lead to hell. Hemacandra' mentions especially the use of honey in the Sarvite devu-māna, and the false idea that it is holy. No doubt because of the traditional method of honey-gathering which involves the destruction of the hive by smoking out the bees it has become a proverbial saying that he who eats honey takes on himself the sin of burning seven villages.*

THE VRATAS

FIVE anu-vratas, three guna-vratas, and four siksā-vratas, making a total of twelve, are listed in the Upāsaka-dašāh, together with the supplementary, and by its nature non-obligatory, sallekhanāerata. Except for one text of minor importance the mediaeval ācārvas show no hesitations in the enumeration of the anu-vratas. but the guna-vratas and siksā-vratas to which the Digambaras give the collective designation of silas, vary considerably in their sequence, certain elements, generally the desavakasika-vrata which is by its nature susceptible of being confounded with the dig-vrata. being at times eliminated to allow of the inclusion of sallekhanā among the śiksā-vratas. The anu-vratas are of course closely parallel to the mahā-vratas of an ascetic, and it is therefore not surprising that some writers have imitated the Daśa-vaikālika-sūtra which counts a sixth mahā-vrata-that of a-rātri-bhojana-in the anuvratas. In fact this sixth anu-vrata is noted by Camundarayas (and at a later date by Sakalakirti) though no list of five aticaras seems ever to have been devised for it.6

The anu-vratas are: alumsā, satya, asteya, brahma, and aparagraha. The Dharma-rasāyana is alone in substituting for the first of these the prohibition of killing living creatures for sacrifice to

&lt;sup>1</sup> Handiqui, p. 263. <sup>2</sup> PASU 70. <sup>3</sup> YŚ in. 41. <sup>4</sup> Śr (A) v. 28. <sup>5</sup> CS. p. 7.

Sr (A) v. 28.
 CS, p. 7.
 Other writers such as Viranandm in his treatise on the monastic life, the Aira-stra, count a-rātn-bhojana as an additional mahā-vrata.

the gods (devatā-nimittam a-jiva-maraņa), the ahiṃsā-vrata itself being relegated to a place among the guna-vratas.

The variations in the guna-vratas and sikṣā-vratas can best be shown in tabular form:

GUNA-VRATAS

	GUNA-VI	RATAS
Śvetāmbaras	dig-vrata	bhogopabhoga	anartha-danda
Tattvārtha-sūtra	1)	1
Cāmundarāya Amrtacandra	11	1	1
Somadeva	dig-vrata	deśāvakāsika	anartha-danda
Amitagati	1}	1	ļ
Rājamalla	11	1	1
Vāmadeva	11	1	1
Vasunandın	/	i	1
Samantabhadra	h	1	1
Aśādhara	11	1	1
Medhävin	{ {	1	1
Sakalakirtı	11.	1	1
Somasena	dig-vrata	anartha-danda	bhogopabhoga
Kärttikeya	11	1	1
Kundakunda Devasena		1	1
Sivakoti	1)	}	1
Padmanandin <sup>1</sup>	anartha-danda	ahımsā	bhogopabhoga

SIKSI-VBATAS

		IKSA-VRATAS
Svetāmbaras	sämäyıka	deśāvakāšika	poşadhopavasa	dāna
Tattvärtha-sütra	h .	1		1
Cāmundarāya	11	1
Amrtacandra	11			Į.
Amitagati	) sāmāyika	posadhopavāsa	bhogopabhoga	dāna
Somadeva				1
Våmadeva	11		İ
Rājamalla	,			1
Samantabhadra	h	1
Aśādhara	11	1	l	1
Medhävin	deśävakäśika	sāmāyıka	poşadhopavâsa	dāna
Sakalakirtı	11
Somasena	,
Kärttikeya	sämäyıka	poşadhopaväsa	dāna	deśāvakāsika
Kundakunda	)
Devasena	sämäyika	posadhopaväsa	dāna	sallekhanā
Sıvakoţı	11		1
Padmanandin	()	1
Vasunandın	bhoga	upabhoga	dāna	sallekhană

Certain points are made clear by a glance at these tables. It has been remarked that the guna-vratas are additional vows, special cases in fact of the anu-vratas, whilst the siksā-vratas refer to spiritual exercises. The Svetambaras, even those among them who follow the Tattvartha-sutra in some interpretations, insist on the designations guna-vrata and śiksā-vrata and have also, as is logical, retained the sequence which leaves these two types of vows distinct. The Digambaras who follow the Tattvartha-sutra have blurred this distinction by making the desavakasika-vrata follow the dig-vrata to which it is related in content, the bhogopabhogavrata being inserted immediately before the dana-vrata probably because of resemblances in the aticaras. Another Digambara current stemming from Samantabhadra agrees with the Syetambara tradition except in the one minor detail that it transposes the sāmāvika- and deśāvakāśika-vratas. (Kārttikeva puts the deśāvakāsika- after the dana-vrata.) Kundakunda, Devasena, and one or two others suppress the desawakasika-vrata altogether and give sallekhanā twelfth place on the list. Vasunandin, who follows the Tattvārtha-sūtra for the order of the guna-vratas, eliminates the sāmāyika- and posadhopavāsa-vratas altogether probably because the same subjects are treated as pratimas and creates in their place a bhoga-vrata and an upabhoga-vrata.
In this and the following tables the author of the Dharma-raidyana is meant.

It is possible to discern in the treatment of the vratas and their attaras a number of different traditions which it is of importance to note:

- The orthodox Svetāmbara tradition rigidly faithful to the Upāsaka-daśāh.
- Another Svetämbara tradition that owes its origin to Haribhadra, who was considerably influenced by the Tattvärthasütra. This includes Hemacandra and the seventeenthcentury Yaśovijaya.
- 3. The Digambara tradition based on the Tattvārtha-sūtra.
- Another Digambara tradition going back to Samantabhadra, who compiled completely new lists of aticaras for some vratas. He is followed by Sakalakirti and Somasena.
- One significant writer—Somadeva—who alone has not respected the tradition of five attcāras for each vrata.

The following table will show in detail how the atteāras are treated by them.

<sup>1</sup> The designations of the atioāras vary considerably from writer to writer. I have preferred to use, wherever possible, those given in the Upāsaka-dafāh.

C 787

AHIMSA-VRATA

All	bandha	vadha	chas 1-ccheda	atı-bhārāropana	bhakta-pāna- vvavaccheda
		SATYA-VRATA	RATA
Svetāmbaras	sahasābhyākhvāna raho'bhyākhyāna	raho'bhy ākhyāna	sva-dāra-mantra- bheda	mrsopadesa	kūta-lekha-karana
Hemacandra Mānavijaya	sahaskbhvākhy āna	guhva-bhāsana	v iśvasta~mantra~ bheda	mrsopadesa	kūta-lekha-karana	JAIN and Haribhadra	ny asapahara	raho'bhy ākhvāna	sva-džra-mantra- bheda	mrsopadeśa	kūta-lekha-karana	A Y
Tattvārtha-sūtra Cāmundarāya Amracandra Āšāchara Medhāvin Bacanatis	រាγនីនធិបាត់កំពុ	raho'bhvākhyāna	sākāra-mantra- bheda	mrśopadeśa	kūta-lekha-karana	GA
Samantabhadra	nvāsāpahāra	raho bhyākh āna	paisunts	parıvāda	kūta-lekha-karana
Somarena	nyāsāpahāra	guhya-bhāṣana,	mantra-bheda	mrsopadesa	kūta-lekha-karana paistnya

kūta-lekha-karana

panvāda

mūdha-sāksı-padoktı

Somadeva

mantra-bheda mantra-bheda paisunts

raho bhyākhyāna guhva-bhāṣana, paisunya paisunva

at-pratirupakapautavädhikya kāma-bhoga-tīvrābhilāşa tivräbhiläsa kāma-bhogavyavahára pautava-nyūnatā kūta-tula-kūtapara-vivāhakarana māna vigrahe samgraho rāyyātikrama ananga-kridā rthasya viruddha-BRAHMA-VRATA ASTEYA-VRATA stena-prayoga stena-karman a-parigrhîtăgamana ıtvara-parıgrhitästenāhrtādāna stenährtädäna gamana Somadeva except Āśādhara except

Sakalakirtı	ıtvarıkā-gamana	vijatra	ananga-krida	para-vivāha- karana
Sommen	parastn-gamana	١	ananga-krida	para-vıvāha- karana
		APARIGRAHA-VRATA	1A-VRATA
All	kşetra-vastu	hranya-suvarna	dhana-dhānya	dvipada-catușpada
Somadeva	kşetra-vastu	śayanāsana	dhana-dhānya	dvipada-catuspada
Sakalakirtı	ati-vahana	atı-samgraha	ati-vismaya	sti-lobha

THE VRATAS

kāma-bhoga-tīvrābhilāşa

2	_
Inn
A-RITACIO
•	_
and all and a	atikrama

adho-dig-atikrama

ürdhva-dig-atıkrama

ΨI

DIG-VRATA

Ë 묶 ā
5
Ĭ.
Ħ

ats-bhäräronana

kupys stuspada kupya

BHOGOPABHOGA-VRATA

Svetāmbaras	sacıttāhāru	sacstta-pratiba- ddhähāra	apakvauşadhı	duspakvauşadhı	tucchauşadhı
Haribhadra Hemacandra Mānavyaya and Digambaras	sacttāhāra	sacıtta-pratıba- ddhähāra	sacitta-sammı- śráhára	duspakvausadhı	abhisava
Somsdeva	nşıddhähāra	jantu-samba- ddhāhāra	jantu-sammi- śráhěra	duspakvausadhı	avīksitāhāra	r
Samantabhadra Sakalakirtı	vişavānupeksā	visayānusmrti	v.işayatıtrşā	visavātilaulya	vişayanubhava	AIN
		ANARTHA-DAŅĎA-VRATA	4DA-VRATA		100	A VOG
		The same of the sa

ANARTHA-DANDA-VRATA

		WIND THE PROPERTY OF	With the state of Svetāmbaras	kandarpa	kautkucya	maukharya	samyuktādhikarana upabhoga-	upaphogaexcept					pariphogătireka
Hanbhadra
pure	Kandarba	Kaurkucya	mauxparya	asamikšyadnikarana   upabnoga-	-sgougga-
Digambaras /					pariphogātireka except Samantabhadra
Sakalakirtı	kandarpa	kautkucva	maukharya	asamiksyādhikarana ati-prasādhana	ati-prasadhana
Somasena
Somadeva	vañcana-	arampha-	hımsā-	bhārādhikya	atı-kleśa
	pravartana	pravartana	pravartana

-bhogásarpsa a

JAINA YOGA

			Kama-bhogasamsa	RURDIN		nidana
		maranaéamen	Maranisamea		maran a commendation	Bellinger
VA-VRATA		Jiv Itāšamsa	Jivitāšamsa		Jivitāśamsa
SALLEKHANA-VRATA		para-lokāśamsa	mitranuraga		mitta-smrti
	the letter.	ma-locasamsa	adding and a second	bhov.	eran) a
	Svetambarse	Digambaras	except	Samantabhadra

		para-pasandi samstava
	Dara-nesand.	prasamsä
MYAKTVA	Vicikitsä
SAMY	kānkṣā
	śanka
	=

The attaāras given in the Upāraka-daāāh are specifically described as 'typical' (peyāla), but though Abhayadeva' draws attention to this in his commentary on the stira pointing out that the set of five infractions attached to each vrata is not a restrictive definition (avadhārana) but a symbolic indication (upladhārana) of other similar offences, little heed has been in practice paid to this and the Digambaras in particular seem to regard the attaāras as furnishing the detailed draft of a moral code.

With the exception of Asadhara, who has here borrowed from Hemacandra, the Digambaras do not appear to take into account the distinction of bhanga and aticara, which has led many Svetāmbara ācārvas into a tangle of sophistry. Whilst an aticāra according to Abhavadeva3 is a lapse from the vow, due, for example, to lack of understanding of it, any conscious and flagrant infraction constitutes a bhanga. Abhayadeva admits he is unable to understand the distinction of bhairea and aticara in the Avasvaka-tika but his own definition is hardly satisfactory. In practice a bhanga is held to be a complete negation of the vrata (for example, the outright refusal to give aims is a bhanga of the dana-vrata) whilst an aticara is an offence against the vrata in which the vow is partly kept and partly infringed or, as this might be expressed in over-simplified terms, an aticara is half a bhanga. But other types of transgression, intermediate between bhanga and aticara and involving more subtle differentiations, are also mentioned in the discussion of pratikramana and alocana. such, for example, are the khandita and virādhana. An aticāra, it is considered, may occur when an offence is palliated by ignorance, or when it is carried out through the agency of a third party, or when an evil intention is cherished but not put into effect, or when the spirit but not the letter of an injunction is contravened. It would seem that on this theme of bhanga and aticara the Svetambara acaryas are the prisoners of a traditional exercises which constrains them to contortions of casuistry alien to the very ideas they have set forth in other

To the same type of intellectual hair-splitting belong the computations of the possible number of bhangas of a vrata of which some examples are given under the ahimsā-vrata. It is enough to explain here that any bhanga may be committed in speech, in body, &lt;sup>1</sup> See Schubring, Die Lehre des Jamas, p. 188.

<sup>2</sup> UD 1 56 (pp. 21).

<sup>3</sup> UD 1 56 (pp. 21-22).

CD 1 50 (pp. 21-22).

or in mind (these are collectively referred to as the pada-traya), the offender may himself be guilty of the act (when it is kria), may cause it to be done (when it is kria), or may approve of its being done (when it is animata); together the resulting nine possibilities make up what the Digambaras call the nave-koit. There are also three possible stages in the commission of the offence: preparation (sammanhba), inception (sammanhba), and execution (drambha).

Where anicara of a viata are given (for some Digambaras do not note any) they are always, except in a few cases in the Yafastilaka, five in number. Five is also the number of the anivervatas themselves (except where arätir-bhojana is recognized as a viata) Abhayadeva's explains that they are five, and not four like the mahā-viatas in the times of the twenty-two earlier tirthankaras, because Sailaka-rājā accepted the irāvaka-dharma in the guise of five aniv-viatas and seven other viatas in the presence of Sthāpatyaputra, the pupil of Neminātha. The same writer explains the term aniv-viata as meaning either a vow that is 'minor' (anu) in comparison with the major vows (mahā-viatas) or the vow of a person with an ascetic, or (in the form of aniv-viata) as a vow expounded subsequently to the mahā-viatas;

THE AHIMSA-VRATA

By all the Janna Rääryas, except by the author of the rather aberrant and isolated Dharma-rasāyana, the ahmsā-vrata is recognized as the first of the anu-vratas and even in that work where it is relegated to second place among the guna-tratas its position is taken by a specialized variant of non-violence—the refusal to kill animals in sacrifice to the gods 'This primacy of ahmsā lies at the very root of Jainsm. daya mülu dhamm'-anghrvaha as the Śrāvaka-dharma-dohaka's says; and the instinct is sound which leads Amyta-candra to explain every other tratas as but a restatement in different terms of the content of the first.

Amongst the Digambaras it is Amrtacandra,4 and next to him Amitagati,5 who have devoted most attention to refuting argue ments commonly advanced in the world in criticism of absolute

```
<sup>1</sup> P (ŚrDh) 7
<sup>2</sup> Duha 40
<sup>4</sup> PASU 79-89
<sup>5</sup> Śr (A) vi 33-44.
```

ahimsā. They point out that it is wrong to kill destructive creatures -and by this lions, tigers, snakes, and scorpions, and similar dangerous animals and insects are intended-in the belief that by so doing other living creatures will be saved from death or injury. Slaughter for the purpose of extirpating evil is as senseless as cutting down a tree with an axe in order to make it grow. Since destructive creatures when slain go to a fate of great misery those who inflict such misery on them will inevitably incur great guilt. It is equally contrary to the concepts of true religion to destroy creatures that are in a state of wretchedness on the assumption that they will be out of their misery when dead, for of necessity they will be reborn in another incarnation where their plight may be vet worse. Vigorously to be combatted is the teaching of those who maintain that a good disciple should cut off the head of his preceptor when through constant practice of religion he has achieved a mental state which will assure him a happy reincarnation; for it is fallacious to imagine that since the attainment of happiness is difficult the blissful if killed will remain blissful. To claim that the religious life stems from the gods and therefore to them all things are to be offered, or to assert that there is no fault in slaughtering goats or other animals to satisfy the duties of hospitality, are other untenable points of view. The contention that it is better to kill one higher animal than to destroy a very great number of lower forms of life is refuted by the explanation that the carcass will inevitably be full of minute organisms called nigodas. For this reason perhaps, too, it is forbidden to kill oneself in order to offer one's body as food for the starving.

Amptacandra is concerned on these issues mainly with the refutation of other creeds, but in ordinary life the commonest problem to present itself in the application of the doctrine of ahimsi would probably be whether or not it is licit to kill a destructive animal, and in fact the question is put and answered by a number of writers including Asiahara' and Hemacandra. Hemacandra: in fact is the only mediaeval Svetämbara authority on sirācahāciāra to treat at length of the wider issues of ahimsā, though at an earlier epoch they had been discussed in the Srāvaka-praijāpāti.

The nature of the layman's ahimsā-vrata depends on the distinction between sūksma-himsā, the taking of life in any form, abstention from which is obligatory for the ascetic, and sthailhimial, the destruction of the higher forms of hie from dvindriyar upwards, which is forbidden to all Jainas. The layman is also enjoined to avoid as far as possible the killing of ekendriyas and the useless destruction of sthawara-jivas. The objection is sometimes raised that since the monk has renounced himia, whether krta, karita, or aumata, he should not instruct the layman to maintain only sthaila-himia since this amounts to an implicit assent to the killing of ekendriyas. To elucidate the monk's attitude a parable' is narrated.

The wives of a certain king obtained permission from their husbands to leave the women's quarters and visit the city by night. To ensure that they could do so unmolested he gave order that all the men of the city should be outside the walls by dusk. However, the aix sons of a merchant were detained by some business in their counting-house and failed to leave. They were arrested and condemned to death. Their father besought the king for pardon but was only able to obtain the release of the youngest one by a reasoned plea to the ruler. Here the sons who are executed are the inventibulary and the plea is his exposition of the dharma at the time that the layman takes the aqu-evatas. He knows that the israolaba will not spare the lives of all living beings and so he attermst to save at least some of them.

Himai may be either inherent in an occupation (arambha-ja) or intentional (sanhalpa-ja), in other words, unrelated to the occupation (arāmahha-ja). Offences against the vrata may be either conscious (arāmahha-ja) or fortutious (anarthaka), and in the former case they may be committed with due care and attention (lapeka) or carelessly unrapeksa. These distinctions are sometimes known as bihedas.

Himiz does not depend on acts alone: the vrata will be broken merely by the absence of compassion shown when a man allows himself to be carried away by anger. A distinction can therefore be made between bhave-limiza (the intention to hurt) and dravya-himiza (the actual hurt).<sup>2</sup>

The ancāras of this vrata are given in the same form by Svetāmbaras and Digambaras:

(i) keeping in captivity (bandha);

<sup>1</sup> See Haribhadra's comm on SrPr 115 or Municandra's comm. on DhB iii 16.

<sup>2</sup> NPP 22.

<sup>3</sup> T (S) vii 8 (p. 64).

- (ii) beating (vadha),
- (iii) mutilating (chavi-ccheda):
- (iv) overloading (ati-bhārāropana):
  - (v) depriving of food and drink (bhakta-pāna-vyavaccheda),
- (i) BANDHA. This according to Harıbhadra<sup>1</sup> applies to the tying up or keeping in captivity of men or beasts. Siddhasena Ganin2 stresses that this is very often utterly wanton as when ants, or other insects, are tied for amusement. It may, however, be quite legitimate when an unruly child, or slave, or servant has to be corrected or when horses, cattle, buffaloes, or elephants are kept for domestic use. The general view seems to be that such actionand this applies to the other contraventions of this vrata-ranks as an aticara when done in anger. This is stressed by Hemacandra,3 who defines bandha as 'the restraining of cattle by ropes and withies or the restraining of one's children for the sake of correcting them'. The tying should be done with consideration (sapeksa), the rope being knotted loosely so that it can be easily slipped in case of fire. Aśadhara+ follows Hemacandra in his explanation but notes also that it is licit to bind a thief or other intruder who may have entered one's home. Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāyas state simply that bandha means fastening with a rope to a block or post in such a way as to restrict freedom of movement from place to place. This and the following aticaras they appear to take as referring only to animals.
- (11) VADHA.6 Haribhadra7 explains this as 'thrashing with whips'. When occasion arises, says Siddhasena Ganin,8 a pious layman may administer a whipping to a person or animal in his charge with due consideration for age and avoiding any vital spot; pulling the ears or slapping is also permissible. The consensus of later opinion is perhaps best expressed by Devendrao when he says that it is merciless flogging that constitutes the aticara. The Digambaras define vadha as 'the beating of living creatures with rods, whips, or withies'.

```
<sup>1</sup> Åv (H), p 820a
5 YS m. 90 (p. 547).
```

2 T (S) VII. 20

<sup>4</sup> SDhA IV. 16. 5 CS, p. 5.

<sup>6</sup> This aticara has sometimes erroneously been rendered as 'killing'. 7 Åv (H), p 810b. 8 T (S) vii, 20. 9 SrDK, pt. ii, p 84.

- (iii) CHAVI-CCHEDA. For Haribhadra2 this implies 'cutting the body with swords and other sharp instruments'. The word chave is in fact variously interpreted as 'body' or 'skin'. The Tattvārtha-bhāsya introduces3 here the idea of purposeless cutting of the bark of trees and Siddhasena Ganin extends this to the wounding of ap-kāyas by cutting ice or of prthvi-kāyas by disturbing the ground, offences which later are usually found under the anarthadanda-vrata. But, as he notes, this aticara applies rather to branding and ear-piercing or to methods of punishment used to intimidate criminals such as cutting off the nose and ears, or fingers and thumbs. Such chavi-ccheda is of course merciless and devoid of consideration (nirapeksa) but it ceases to be an aticara when it is done with due care (sapeksa), for example, in lancing a boil. Hemacandra+ mentions as an instance of beneficent chaviccheda opening the swollen leg of a person suffering from elephantiasis (pāda-valmīka). For the Digambaras, this atuāra implies the mutilation of the ears, or nose, or other organs of the body.
- (w) Ati-bhara's Opana. Harbhadra's understands by this the loading on to the back, or shoulders, or head of an animal or human being of an excessive weight of goods such as betel nuts. Siddhasena Gapin's comments that a Jaina ought not to make his living by bhājaka-kaman or iahala-kaman without are forbidden trades, but, if unable to do otherwise, he should load his oxen or other beasts of burden with a load rather below the maximum that they can bear and unyoke them during the heat of the day, grung them food and water, whilst human beings should not be expected to carry more than they can take without undue effort. Pūjyapāda and Camundarāya' define this aticāra as the loading on oxen or other animals, out of greed, of a burden greater than they can bear.
- (v) BHANTA-PANA-VYANACCHEDA. Siddhasena Gannī¹ says that the stinting of food or water to man or beast without cause is always to be avoided. For the moral good of undisciplined children or the physical good of fever patients it is, however, admissible when done with due care. The Digambaras understand this atacara to mean 'provoking the suffering of hunger or thirst in animals for any reason.³

In Jama jurisprudence chavi-ccheda is one of the seven forms of danda-niti; it covers any mutilation inflicted in punishment of a crime. See Arhanniti, ii 2.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Åv (H), p. 819b <sup>2</sup> T (S) vii. 20 <sup>4</sup> YS iii. 90 (p. 547). CS, p. 5. <sup>6</sup> Åv (H), p. 819b.

'How can there be any atteara of the ahimsa-vrata which is designed to express a renunciation of killing if in fact no killing has taken place?" This question is often raised by the Svetambara ācārvas, only to be answered at once by the explanation that where the intention to hurt or kill arises under the influence of anger and other passions there is bhava-himsa. Even if there is no dravvahimsa or physical injury the vrata will have been infringed by the putting away of compassion. In a phrase of Amrtacandra2 himsā exists wherever raga and dvesa occur even though no creature perishes. A mere thought in an angry man's mind is himsa; once delivered to the empire of his passions he destroys himself even if he destroys no other living being. Conversely where a person of pure life, for example, a sadhu practising irva-samiti, inadvertently extinguishes the life of a jiva he does not bind on himself further karma. Aticaras of the layman's ahimsa-vrata therefore occur when the vow is broken in spirit (antar-vrttva) through anger but kept in the letter (bahur-vrttva), for example, when an animal is beaten mercilessly but recovers owing to its natural strength.3

Many writers are preoccupied by the calculation of the number of ways in which the vrata can be broken. Thus for Amitagati4 a bhanga may be krta, kārsta, or anumata, may be committed in speech, in body, or in mind, may refer to the stages of samrambha, samārambha, or ārambha and may belong to any one of the four kasāyas. krodha, māna, māyā, or lobha: from this computation, which is that of the Tattvartha-sutra, he derives a total of 108 forms of himsā. Devaguptas reckons 243 bhangas of the ahimsā-vrata: krta, kārita, or anumata, in speech, in body, or in mind, committed against the nine categories of ityas in past, present, or future time. Hemacandra6 prefers a more complex calculation: each offence may be committed in speech, in body, in mind, in speech and body together, in speech and mind together, in mind and body together, or in speech, body, and mind together, and each may be krta, kārita, anumata, krta-kārita, krtānumata, kāritānumata, or krta-kārttānumata; and the variants which result may occur in past, present, or future time, giving a possible total of 147 bhangas. It seems idle to follow the acarvas into the network of these theoretical speculations, and though they are applied to many injunctions of the Jaina creed, and recur with increasing frequency in the later texts in tabulated form, no further allusion will be made to them in the present study.

UD 1. 45 (p. 7)

&lt;sup>2</sup> PASU 41-48 <sup>5</sup> NPP 21.

&lt;sup>3</sup> ŚrDK, pt. si, p. 84. <sup>6</sup> YŚ is. 18 (p. 192).

The content of the ahima-v-rata is much wider than the aticara indicate, though many subjects which are treated under this head by early writers are later held to fall within the province of the anartha-danda-v-rata and the bhogopabhoga-v-rata. The Srāvaka-parjāpati¹ records that the practice of ahimā implies the straining of water through a cloth and the use of grain that is free from weevils. Siddhasena Caṇini¹ mentions the ban on the consumption of meat, alcohol, and honey as forming part of the ahimā-v-rata. Somadeva-¹ too, includes under it the obligation to avoid unstrained water, abhakıyar, ananta-kāyar, an artar-hoigna. Aśādhara-¹ waton notes that the lay estate cannot exist without activity (arambha) or activity without killing, deals especially under the ahimā-v-rata with eating by night and meat-eating.

It is the eating of meat and the sacrifice of animals that provoke Hemacandra* to an attack on the himid-dairta as he calls the Mamyrit. It is, a says, a hideous distortion of reality to pretend that animals have come into existence to be offered to the divinities for the prosperity of the world and that the jirdar inhabiting them will be reborn as divine beings. Those who perform such sacrifices will go to the lowest hell, and even a wretched athest, a cărvaka, will have a better destiny than the hypocrites who preach a hūmma of cruelty. That men abandon the dharma of compassion for this repellent creed is evidence of the evul of the age. If sacrificial victims really went to an abode of bluss why should not one kill one's parents in the sacrifice? How can figures like Siva, Skanddla, Vispiu, or Yama, who are represented with terrible weapons, be adored as divinities? Luke many other Jaina writers, Hemacandra quotes the famous verse:

savve jīvā vi uchanti jīvium na marijjum tamhā pāni-vaham ghoram nigganthā vajjayanti nam b

'Killing horrifies because all beings wish to live and not to be slain.' It would here be well to stress that ahimsā is not something negative; it is another aspect of dayā—compassion—in Hemacandra's

```
<sup>1</sup> SrPr 259. <sup>2</sup> T (S) vii. 8 <sup>3</sup> Handiqui, p 264.

<sup>4</sup> SDhA iv 12. <sup>5</sup> YS ii. 33-49.
```

<sup>6</sup> Daśa-vaikālika-sūtra, gāthā, 219.

words 'the beneficent mother of all beings', 'the elixir for those who wander in suffering through the ocean of reincarnation'. This positive ahimsā is expressed in the form of karuna-dāna or abhaya-dāna, the giving of protection to all living creatures.

For Somadeva! who emphasizes this positive aspect, ahimā as in the Tattvārtha-sūtra' is compounded of maitrī—the non-infliction of suffering, pramoda—affection combined with respect for the virtuous, kārunya—charity to help the needy, and mādhyathya—a state of equaminity without attraction or repulsion in regard to those who are devoid of virtues. Evil, he says, cannot dwell in a man crowned with the halo of compassion for this quality is more efficacious than the practice of all ceremonies.

THE SATYA-VRATA

The term safya has been given such a wide connotation here that it is scarcely possible to render it merely as 'truth'. Its specifically Jaina interpretation was already apparent to Pulyapaïda as his commentary on the Tatteārtha-situra' shows. In fact the amplitude of this vrata has been concisely expressed by Vasunandim' as the abstention from untruth spoken out of passion or hate, and from truth, too if it provides the destruction of a living being.

From the earliest times certain divisions or delimitations of satya have been established in the texts. The most primitive (dating from the older Āvaiyaka literature) takes the following form (based on the gifts most commonly mentioned):

- (i) untruth relating to a girl (kanyālika), e.g. saying that a girl is or is not a virgin;
- (ii) untruth relating to a cow (gav-alika), e.g. saying that a cow gives much milk or little milk;
- (iii) untruth relating to land (bhūmy-alika), e.g. saying that a piece of land belongs to oneself or belongs to another person:
- (iv) untruth told for the sake of making away with a pledge (nyāsa-harana), e.g. falsely denying that gold or other valuables have been entrusted to one;
- (v) bearing false witness (kūṭa-sākṣya).
  - <sup>1</sup> Handiqui, p 264. <sup>2</sup> T (P) vii. 11. <sup>3</sup> Ibid. 14 <sup>4</sup> Sr (V) 200.

The above classification is that of the Pañcāshak¹ but it is given without perceptible variation in all Svetāmbara works, from the Srāaka-prajiaphi onwards, that treat of the wratas. Ašādhara¹ borrows it from Hemacandra but is not followed by any other Digambara writer except Medhāvin, who mentions only the first three categories. It should be noted that in all cases these three forms of aastya are interpreted as upalakṣanas or symbolic examples so that they cover any false statements made in reference to human beings (kanyālīka), anumals (gav-alīka), or inanimate objects (bhūmy-alīka).

Another classification which bears the stamp of the logicians divides asatva into the following categories:3

- (i) denial of what is (bhūta-mhnava or sad-alapana), e g 'there is no ātman'; 'there is no pāpa'; 'there is no punya', or 'Devadatta is not here' (when in fact he is present);
- (11) assertion of what is not (asad-udbhāvana or abhūtodbhāvana), e.g. 'the ālman is immanent' (sarvagata), or 'the ālman is of the size of a grain of millet or rice' or 'the pot is there' (when in fact it is not there).
- (ii) representation of something in a form other than its real form (arthäntara or viparita), e.g. describing a cow as a horse or saying, as do the Buddhists, that the ātman is noneternal or, as do the Sänkhyas, that it is eternal,
- (iv) reprehensible speech (nmdya)—in Hemacandra's terminology garhita—which is again subdivided into:
  - (a) speech that is tactlessly hurtful (apriya) as, for example, in alluding to a person's physical deformity. Nothing should be said to cause embarrassment, anxiety, or unhappiness to others;
  - (b) speech that is insulting (garhya)—in Hemacandra ākrośarūpa—or inspired by malice or mockery, e.g. calling someone a bastard;
  - (c) speech in which encouragement to harmful actions is given (sācadya). This would include not only advice to steal or to kill but even an injunction such as 'plough the fields'.

&lt;sup>1</sup> P ($rDh) 11. <sup>2</sup> Sr (A) vi. 49-54; PASU 01-08.

<sup>4</sup> YS 11 57; textually yathā are bāndhakineya sty āds

The foregoing classification is given not only by the Digambaras Amitagati and Amrtacandra but also in the Yoga-śāstra where the treatment goes back directly to Siddhasena's commentary on the Tattvārtha-sūtra1 and indeed to the Svetāmbara Bhāsva. The three types of nindya speech (styled garhita in the Bhāsya) are, in corresponding order, passūnva-vukta, pārusva-vukta, and himsā-vukta.

Since in general it would seem that in numerical presentations the tetrads are older than the pentads, the fivefold classification set out in the Nava-pada-prakarana2 and repeated by Yasodeva3 in his commentary on the Pañcasaka is probably a later development. On the authority of a Prakrit verse quoted this is given as: (i) abhūtodbhavana, (ii) bhūta-nihnava, (iii) vibarīta, (iv) garhva, (v) sāvadva, Asadharas too has five categories but he has arrived at them by suppressing the savadya class, doubtless from a feeling that it was unnecessary because identical with the pāpopadeša division of anarthadanda. With that exception he has faithfully followed Hemacandra's enumeration.

Somadevas gives another fourfold division of satya and asatya:

- (1) satya-satya-what is wholly true, the exact reproduction of
- (11) asatya-satya-a statement part true, part false in which the falsehood predominates, e.g. weave the cloth, (where it would be more accurate to say weave the varn);
- (111) satyāsatya-again a statement part true, part false, but with truth predominating, e.g. promising to give something within a fortnight and giving it only after a month or a year; (iv) asatyāsatya-what is wholly false, e.g. promising to give
- something which it is not within one's power to give.

Āśādhara<sup>6</sup> incorporates this rather casuistic analysis into his srāvakācāra but no other writer appears to have noted it. In conformity with the usage of the world the first three are permissible but the fourth is always to be avoided.

For the five aticaras the older Svetambara authorities maintain unchanged the list of the Upāsaka-daśāh:

- sudden calumniating (sahasāhhvākhvāna);
- (ii) secret calumniating (raho'bhyākhyāna);

- (iii) divulging the confidences of one's wife (sva-dāra-mantrabheda):
- (iv) spreading of false information (mrsopadesa);
- (v) false statements expressed in writing (kūṭa-lekha-karaṇa).

However, even here, there are some divergencies in interpretation. The oldest Digambara list, that of the Tattvartha-sûtra,1 varies sva-dāra-mantra-bheda to sākāra-mantra-bheda (at its origin probably no more than a textual corruption), omits sahasābhyākhyāna, and from the primitive categories of asatya borrows nvāsāpahāra, assigning to it the vacant space in the aticara pentad. This pattern is followed by Amrtacandra,2 Camundaraya, and Aśadhara and, one may add, by Amitagati<sup>3</sup> though there is some blurring of the distinction between the second and third infractions called by him 'revealing of secret actions' (prakāśanā guhya-vicestitanam) and 'divulging the confidences of others' (paramantra-bheda). Haribhadra, in the Dharma-bindu,4 has kept the original Svetämbara version except for the replacement of sahasābhyākhyāna by nyāsāpahāra. Hemacandra5 on the contrary has preferred to retain sahasābhvākhvāna, he recognizes rahu'bhvākhyāna as a variant reading for this and fills its place in the list by guhya-bhāsana whilst for sva-dāra-mantra-bheda he gives viśvastamantra-bheda. In other words, for the second and third aticaras, he is in exact agreement with Amitagati. Samantabhadra6 follows the Tattvartha-sutra but for sakara-mantra-bheda and mrsopadesa he has paisunva and parivada (for his commentator Prabhacandra the use of these terms does not change the meaning). For this anu-vrata as for others. Somadeva's list of aticaras is the most aberrant: mudhā-sāksi-padōkti (false witness), mantra-bheda (revealing of confidences), paisunva, parivada, and kūta-lekhana. It is clear therefore that for him paisunva cannot have the sense that Prabhācandra gives to it or it would be tautological. It would probably be more correct to give to it its everyday meaning of 'calumny' and to parivada that of 'reproach'. Yet it must be pointed out in support of Prabhacandra's explanation that Amitagati in the Subhasitaratna-samdoha uses the term paiśunya to describe what in his Śrāvakācāra he calls prakāśanā guhya-vicesptānām and that Siddhasena Ganin<sup>8</sup> equates paisunya with what is apriva.

The interpretation of these various aticaras even when they bear the same designation shows considerable variations:

- (i) SAHASABHYÄKHYÄNA. Haribhadra,¹ quoting the Āvaiyaka Cārni, defines this as imputing to someone without due reflection a non-existent fault, such as saying, ¹You are a thief, you are an adulterer¹. There is a danger that the victim might be killed or otherwise punished for this if the calumny were overheard by all-intentioned person. According to a Prakrit verse² quoted anonymously by Abhayadeva and again by Hemacandra this transgression is a bhainga when spoken intentionally in the knowledge that it is untrue and an aticāra in other circumstances.
- (a) RAHO'BHYĀRHYĀNA. In the traditional Śwetāmbara interpretation, that of the #acqivaha Cārmi and Haribhadra? the example cited for this atacāra is to say: 'They are discussing an act directed against the king'; the consequences for the persons thus caluminated are obvious. But already Siddhasena Ganni thad given an explanation drawn from the wo-dāra-manita-abheda atacāra. In his view this offence is committed if, for example, an older woman is told that her husband is in love with a young grl or if a younger woman is given to understand that her husband is infatuated with a more mature rival, or if a man is informed that his wife denigrates him, saying that he is a lecherous brute (kāma-gardabha). Such allegations made by way of gibes constitute aticāras, but if there is a conscious evil intent (abhinitesia) underlying them they are bhangas.
- (iii) SVA-DÂRA-MANTRA-BHEDA. Haribhadra² defines this as the divulging to others of what has been said by one's wife in confidence under special circumstances. His explanation is followed by successive Svetämbara authorities. Yasodeva² takes the word dāra as an upalaksana to include 'friends' and Hemacandra² goes further, designating this aitiāra as orivauta-mantrabheda. The gravity of this transgression, as is pointed out from the Avatyaka Cārja towards, lies in the fact that it might bring about the death of the wife (or friend) through shame. Because of this evil potentiality there is in it an element of bhanga and at the same time, if it is true, an element of abhanga so that it can properly

<sup>1</sup> Åv (H), p. 821b 2 P (ŚrDh)12. 4 T (S) vu. 21 (p. 105).

&lt;sup>3</sup> Åv (H), p. 821b <sup>5</sup> Åv (H), p. 821b.

<sup>6</sup> P(Y) 11 (p. 60)

<sup>7</sup> YS 111, Qr.

be classed as an aticara. Siddhasena Sūri' notes that in this offence a fact which ought not to be revealed is divulged by a person concerned and not, as in the preceding one, by a third

- (iv) MRSOPADESA. This is explained by Siddhasena Ganin<sup>2</sup> as 'words that may cause suffering to others' such as 'Let the camels and donkeys be loaded' or 'Let the slaves be beaten'. On the basis of the Bhasya he gives also as an alternative interpretation 'showing someone how to get the better of someone else in a dispute'. Both ideas are adopted by Hemacandra; but the second is preferred by the other Svetambara texts from the Avasvaka Curni onwards. From 'instruction in methods of deceit' this aticara is extended to cover the encouragement of the study of texts mainly concerned with falsehood, Devendra,4 however, narrows it down to 'teaching the use of unknown mantras and herbs'. The conventional Digambaja view, exemplified by Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāva,5 understands by this aticara the giving of advice which would be prejudicial to the attainment of moksa or to rebirth in the deva-loka. Aśadharas offers in addition to this the choice of the first two explanations favoured by Hemacandra, If the commentator Prabhācandra is to be trusted the parivada of the Ratna-karanda7 is to be understood as mriopadeia.
- (v) KÜTA-LEKHA-KARĀNA, Haribhadra,8 and in general the Svetämbara writers, understand by this the counterfeiting of another person's seal, or stamp, or the use of such a seal with a false text, but Siddhasena Ganino more specifically relates it to the false writing of symbols on birch bark. The Digambara definition is 'alleging in writing with intent to deceive that what was not in fact said or done by someone was said or done by him'. 10 Aśadhara11 notes both the Svetambara and Digambara versions. Abhayadeva,12 Hemacandra, and others say that this offence, though a flagrant breach of truth, is an aticara and not a bhanga because the vrata in its literal sense applies to the speaking, and not to the writing, of asatva.

NYASAPAHARA. The Tattvārtha-bhāsva13 defines this as 'the taking of a pledge deposited by another person and forgotten'.

```
1 PrSU, p 72.
                         2 T (S) vii. 21 (p 104).
                                                        3 YS in. or
4 ŚrDK, pt. ii, p. 87
                        5 CS, p 5.
                                                        6 SDhA IV 45.
7 RK 111 10.
                        " Av (H), p. 8216.
                                                9 T (S) vn. 21 (p. 105).
III CS, p 5
                        11 SDhA IV 45
                                                       12 P (SrDh) 12.
11 T (S) vn 21 (p 105).
```

Siddhasena Ganin expands this by the following example. Suppose someone has deposited in safe custody a sum of five hundred coins but when he comes to collect it, cannot remember whether the figure was five hundred or four hundred. If the holder of the money were to take advantage of that uncertainty to give back only four hundred coins he would be guilty of nyāsāpahāra. The same view is taken by Digambara writers.

SARRA-MANTMA-BHEDA. According to the traditional Digambra interpretation't this is the divulging from jealousy or other motives of the secret intention of another person as divined by watching his gestures or facial expression'. The sixteenth-century commentator Prabhäcandra applies this definition to the attaëra, which Samantabhadra calls paisianya. Siddhasena, in his commentary on the Tattvärtha-sitra; had explained paisianya as 'breaking up a frendship between two people by revealing what one has learned by studying gestures and expression', and guhyaton has learned by studying gestures and expression', and guhyabhāsana as 'divulging affairs of state'. In the Bhāsya both are associated under the head of sāhāra-manta-bheda: Hemacandra in turn groups them as alternative explanations of the guhya-bhāsaṇa atteāra.

In recording the atterns of sthillisative the Svetāmbara texts sometimes note a definition of this, more precise than the general notion that it applies to the layman and not to the ascettc. Thus the Avatyaka Cūrniri defines it as 'speech by which great suffering or great hurt is caused to another person or to oneself', whilst süksmāzatya is 'inaccurate speech used in play or in jest'; for Hari-bhadra' sthulūzatya must be concerned with significant questions, säksmāzatya implying what is trivial.

Positive definitions of satya are sometimes given. The Śrācakaprajāpati, for instance, enjoins that the aim of speech should be the intelligent pursuit of what is best for both worlds and the avoidance of what may cause hurt to others or to oneself or both to others and to oneself. Somadeva considers that in speaking one should aim at measure rather than exaggeration, esteem rather than denigration, and distinction not vulgarity of expression. Amutagat? maintains that all such talk as is reprehensible among mlecchar, dishonourable to those who seek the religious life, and condemned by the doctors of the church is to be avoided; even truth when it results in suffering, fear, or harmful activity (arambha). Kärttikeya' defines the salya-vrata as the avoidance of harmful, harsh, cruel, or secret speech and the use of balanced language that gives satisfaction to all living creatures and expresses the sacred truths.

&lt;sup>1</sup> CS, p. 5

&lt;sup>2</sup> T (S) v1. 21 (p. 106). A Volksetymologie is given: pritin tunayatiti piiunat tadbhāvah pasiunyam. This will be more easily understood if it is put back into a Prakrit form: piin sured iti piuno tab-bhāvo pesumanan A v Ca, p. 285.

* Av (H) 820b. 5 SrPr 264 6 Handiqui, p. 266. 7 Sr (A) v1 45.

The connexion of acutya with human has been brought out in the discussion of the individual aticaras. Amrtacandra<sup>2</sup> emphasizes that even where this is not apparent all acutya contains an element of careless activity (pramatica-yoga) which is at the root of hima. However, for this very same reason a sermon on the performance of religious duties even though it seems to come under the head of unpleasing (aptival) speech is not acutya.

The consequences which may ensue from speaking anatya are dvot on by Hemacandra. A har may have his tongue and an car cut off, may be beaten and imprisoned, treated with contumely, and deprived of his possessions. In another incarnation he may be afflicted with dumbness, speech defects, and foetid breath. Wilful calumny in particular is the root of endless miseries. On the other hand, one who always speaks the truth will, so popular belief avers, never be bitten by a serpent.

In the consideration of asatya the abhyākhyāna infraction has a special importance. It also forms a separate entry in the catalogue of the eighteen pāpa-sthānas, and figures among the āsātanās.

THE ASTEYA-VRATA

THE Svetāmbara writers generally preface any discussion of stealing (steya or caurya or more generally adattādana, 'the taking of what has not been given') by fourfold classification of adatta:

- (1) what is not granted by its owner (svāmy-adatta), e.g. gold;
- (ii) what is not granted by a living creature (jivādatīa), e.g., animal products not given by the slaughtered animal or even a fruit (which has not been given by the jiva inhabiting it);
- 1 KA 333-4. 2 PASU 99-100. 1 YS 11 53-64. 4 NPP 39

- (iii) what is not granted by the Tirthaikara (Tirthaikarādatta), e.g. food specially cooked by the householder for the monks (ādhā-karman) which, is illicit;
- (iv) what is not given to the monks (gurv-adatta), e.g. food even though devoid of impurity which is enjoyed without inviting the gurus.

Devagupta, Yaśodeva, Abhayadeva, Hemacandra, Siddhasena Sūrı, and Ratnaśekhara, listing the adattas, all cite as authority a verse from the tīkā of the Prašna-vyākaraņa sām-jīvādattam Titthayārenam tattheva ya gurūhim eyam adatta-sarūvam parūviyam āgama-dharehim

In fact, of course, it is only the first adatta with which the asteyaerata is concerned.

Objects which can be stolen are divided in two ways;1 either as:

- (i) animate (sacitta) such as salt, horses;
- (ii) manimate (acitta) such as gold, silver:
- (iii) partly animate, partly inanimate (ubhava);

or as.

- (1) two-footed (dvi-pada);
- (ii) four-footed (catus-pada);
- (iii) without feet (apada).

Such categories, of which other similar specimens will be found under the apargraha-vrata, have no practical importance in the discussion of theft. However, Siddhasena's notes these divisions and carefully explains the Bhārya's definition of steya, 'the taking with intent to steal of objects—even of such things as grass—which are in the possession of others or not given by others', in such a way as to include 'what is reprehended by the scriptures', in effect the tirthahārādatta noted above.

The attears of this vow are given alike by Svetāmbaras and Digambaras:

- (i) receiving stolen goods (stenāhṛtādāna);
- (ii) suborning of thieves (taskara-prayoga);
- (iii) transgressing the limits of a hostile state (viruddharājyātikrama).

&lt;sup>1</sup> SrPr 265, Av (H), p. 8226 <sup>2</sup> T (S) vii. 10 (p. 76).

- (iv) using false weights and measures (kūţa-tula-kūţa-māna);
  - (v) substitution of inferior commodities (tat-pratirūpakavyavahāra).

It is only Somadeva's' list which shows certain divergencies: tena-harman may perhaps be interpreted as equivalent to stenaprayoga, and ougrahe samgraho 'rthayo (accumulation of wealth in war-time) has the ment of being less ambiguous than cruiddharaighathrama. The last item, tai-prairipaka-ryavahāra, has been completely omitted but it is possible that the fourth is intended to be split up into two. 'over-weighing' and 'under-weighing', according to whether buying or selling is involved. The Digambaras in general prefer the wording hinādhiha-mānonmāna to describe this atetāra.

- (i) STENAHRTADANA. Suddhasena, following the Tatträtthabhäpya, explans this as 'obtaining goods which are the proceeds of a robbery for nothing or at a low price'. For Harrbhadra' it is 'acquiring cheaply through greed stolen commodities such as saffion from a foreign country'. This explanation is repeated by Devagupta, Abhayadeva, and Yasodeva Hemacandra prefers to follow Siddhasena Ganni. In the literal terms of the crutat this offence is not a bhanga; on the other hand since the thevish intent is present it is a bhanga, so that by definition it can be classed as an atteāra 4 Siddhasena Sūri takes an identical view. Amongst the Digambaras Pūjiyapāda's and Cāmundarāya consider this offence to mean 'obtaining something stolen from a thef without having employed or prompted him', but Āsādhara prefers to adopt Hemacandra's definition
- (ii) SIENA-PRAYOGA. Siddhasena Ganinº explans this as providing theres with money to ply their trade¹ and notes that it is wrong to sell implements of burglary. For Haribhadra' it means approving or encouraging theves by saying. 'You steal this!.' Abhayadeva and Yasideva are of the same opinion. Hemacandra and Siddhasena Sūri leave the choice open between Siddhasena Ganin and Haribhadra. Hemacandra, quoting Abhayadeva, pictures the offender as addressing the thieves in these terms: 'Why do you stand idle.' If you have no food I will give you to eat. If you find no buyer for your wares I will take them.' Such action is a bhanga of the vow not to cause theft to be carried out but at the same time not a bhanga because the instigator does not himself commit theft. In the Digambara view as exemplified by Põiyapäda² and Cāmundarāya this ahtāra amounts to the direct or indirect instigation of theft or the expression of approval for it. Once again Āšādhara³ prefers to follow Hemacandra even to the extent of giving the elaborate details which would seem to belong to a stemalistic.

- (iii) VIRUDDHA-RAJYATIKRAMA, Siddhasena, amplifying the explanation of the Tattvārtha-bhāsya, renders this as 'the acquisition of property in a country which is engaged in hostilities with one's own country since even grass or wood acquired under such circumstances must be regarded as stolen'. For Haribhadras the offence hes merely in the crossing of such a forbidden frontier since the ruler's command is thereby disobeyed. That this would be for the purpose of contraband is implied in Abhayadeva's6 reference. to thievish intent (caurva-buddhi). Hemacandra7 and Siddhasena Suri are more explicit they regard the transgression of the forbidden frontier as a form of svāmv-adatta which would be of the nature of a bhanga, and at the same time not a bhanga because the purpose is to carry out a commercial transaction, Yasodeva8 even extends the aticara to cover all trade in one's own country if forbidden by the ruler, 'The Digambaras Pūjyapāda and Cāmundaravao have a noticeably different interpretation; 'the obtaining of merchandisc by any means other than licit'. Samantabhadra's10 vilopa is given the same definition by Prabhacandra, who then equates it with viruddha-rāivātikrama for, as he explains, goods of great value can be acquired with a small outlay under such circumstances.
- (iv) KOTA-TULA-KOTA-MANA. Siddhasena, "expanding the interpretation of the Tattwärtha-bhäya, explains this as the use of methods which are fraudulent inasmuch as any deviation from the norm is calculated in one's own favour when buying or selling, or fixing rates of interest. Thus a tenfold or elevenfold rate of interest, which is sometimes practised out of greed, is inequitable (anyayya) and illicit. For Haribhadra! the atietam consists in rivine short measure when selling, and taking an excess when buying. Abhayadeva, Yasodeva, and Hemacandra accept the same view. Devendra, I like Siddhasena Gapin, condemus under this head the levying of exorbitant rates of interest. The Digambara definition is extremely precise: 'fraudulent trading in which more is taken for oneself and less given to others when weighing and measuring'.'

<sup>1</sup> YS in. 92. 2 T (P) vn. 27. 3 SDhA iv. 47. 47 (S) vn. 22 (p. 107). 5 Āv (H), p. 823a. 6 F (Srbh) 14 7 YS in. 92. 11 T (S) vn. 22 (p. 107).

<sup>12</sup> Av (H), p. 823a

(v) TAT-PRATIRÜPAKA-VYAVAHĀRA. Siddhasena,3 following the Tattvārtha-bhāsva, understands this as the counterfeiting of gold, silver, brass, copper, oil, ghee, milk, or curds with materials that resemble them in colour, weight, and other properties, as well as the use of fraudulent devices in trading. As an example of these, it is mentioned that when cattle are stolen the shape of their horns can be changed at will if these are fomented with stewed kalingi fruits; otherwise they would be too easily recognizable to be kent or sold. According to Haribhadras this aticara is no more than the adulteration of commodities such as mixing palann with rice, or fat with ghec. Other Svetämbara authorities take the same view. Siddhasena Süri (who gives to this aticara the name of sadrša-vuti) and Hemacandra6 mention amongst other substances mixed with, or substituted for, more valuable ones · khadira resin for asafoetida. and urine for oil Hemacandra considers that this aticara may refer to methods of vyan-karana such as deforming the horns of cattle. For the Digambaras7 it implies 'fraudulent trading in factitious gold and similar commodities, or more specifically in a later text the Prainottara-śrāvakācāra8 'coming false money', but as on other points here again Aśādhara's views belong with the Svetāmbaras. Like the preceding aticara this offence can be held to be a bhanga because people are deprived of their property by false pretences but at the same time not a bhanga because what is involved is in fact just a commercial transaction.9

The transgressions of the aittya-trata discussed above apply, it is clear, more particularly to members of the trading class. But Hemacandra, and with hum Asádhara, lor asse the point that they may also be committed by the king's ministers and other officials. Thus a vassal ruler (támanta) who assists an enemy of the king to whom he owes allegiance is guilty of eruddha-rāyyāthēama.

```
    SrDK, pt 11, p 91
    Av (H), p 823a.
    YS iii 92.
    CS, p 6
    T (S) vii 22 (p 108).
    PSU 273.
    YS iii 92.
    SDBA 11/50.
```

Officials of the royal treasury are also liable to commit the fourth and fifth aticaras in the course of their duties.

Several writers (Abhayadeva, Yasodeva, Hemacandra) quote a verse from the Praina-vvākarana-tīkā:

> coro coravaro manti bheva-nnu kanasa-kkavi anna-do thana-do ceva coro satta-viho mao!

According to this popular dictum the category of thief includes the robber, the receiver, the king's minister, the retail trader, the purveyor of food, and the purveyor of office. Another classification of thieves which would appear to have been taken from a stenaśāstra is too lengthy to be recorded here.

A distinction of sthūla-steya and sūksma-steva is made in the early Syetambara texts. For Haribhadra,2 following the Avasyaka Curni, the latter implies appropriating trivial objects like rubble from the roadside without asking permission.

For the Digambaras the classical definition of theft is contained in the verse of the Ratna-karanda.3

> nihitam vä patitam vä su-vismrtam vä parasvam aviirstam na harati yan na ca datte tad-akrŝa-cauryād uparamanam

'not taking the property of others whether pledged or dropped or forgotten unless it has been given'. Camundarava,4 taking over this definition, adds 'or if abandoned owing to fear of princes or from some other cause'. Vasunandins and the Svetambara Hemacandras have almost identical verses. Somadeva7 insists that nothing that belongs to others may be appropriated 'whether in a house or on the highway or on water or in the woods or in the hills'; and his words are echoed by Amitagati:8 not even a blade of grass is to be taken if it belongs to someone else.

The connexion of theft with himsā is brought out by Amitagati;9 'whoever takes the possessions of a man takes away his life since they represent his external vital force giving him consolation,' Through the suffering he causes to others the thief is to be classed with the oil-presser, the hunter, the butcher, the cat, and the tiger, From another angle it is contended that himsa is a necessary concomitant of theft since it occurs through pramatta-yoga.10

```
P (Y) 14 (p. 67).
4 CS, p. 6.
```

<sup>7</sup> Handiqui, p. 265

<sup>10</sup> PASU 104.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Åv (H), p. 822b.

<sup>5</sup> Sr (V) 211. 8 Sr (A) vi. 60.

<sup>3</sup> RK iii. 11. 6 YS ii. 66.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid. 61-63.

There are reminiscences of the atteāras in some Digambara works which do not enumerate them: the Deādaśanuprekṣā,¹ for example, describes the attey-a-trata in these terms. not buying a valuable article at a low price, being contented with a small profit, not appropriating something that has been forgotten, and not taking the prometry of others through anger or greed.

Äšādharai extends the scope of the asteya-erata in various ways. Thus when any doubt arises as to whether or not an object belongs to oneself to take it would be to break the vow. Nothing that has not been given is to be appropriated with the exception of property from the succession of a dead relative and of such things as the water of a river or the grass of a meadow which are common property. For example, if a burned hoard is found it must be left alone since, as treasure trove, it is without an owner but belongs to the ruler of the state. A late text, the fifteenth-century Prainottara-brācokācara, contains a provision that if a man is unable to leave alone money or other valuables which have been dropped on the ground he should devote them to the performance of pējā in the Jaina temple.

It should be remembered that theft is also one of the seven eyasanas and is treated in many Digambara works under that head.

THE BRAHMA-VRATA

VARIOUS prelimnary classifications, all summarized in the Navapada-prakarana, are current. Thus mention is made elikemty-four, ten, and eight divisions of kāma all ascribed by Devaguipat to the Dharmāriha-kāmādhyayana of the Daisrealkahka-sūtra; Brakma (abstuncen from sexual intercourse) is of eighteen kuda, nei relating to celestial females (raukrya) and nine to terrestiral females (audārāka) Maithma (copulation) is twofold, relating to the vaikrya and audārha classes and the latter is again divided up into animal and human categories. Under this last head are distinguished: wa-dāra (one's own wife or concubine), para-dāra (any wom under the authority of another man), and vefyā (a prostitute who is considered to have no owner).

KA 335

&lt;sup>2</sup> SDhA IV. 46–49 Prasnottara-śrāvakācāra, XIV. 6

NPP 48–50

Further the standpoint from which the whole subject is treated is only understandable on the basis of three sexes (an assumption common to ancient Hindusm and Buddhism) expressed in Janisan in the theory of the three sex urges (veda)—pun, stri, napunuaha.¹ The trad of male, female, and androgyne seems to conserve memories of an earlier stage of society in which the hermaphrodite was accorded a role of special importance.¹ Mitrored in the grammatical categories of the language it offered a neat response to the desire for schematization.

The brahma-erata differs from all the other vows in its double formulation: positive in the sense of 'contentment with one's own wife '(xva-dara-santoya) and negative as 'avoidance of the wives of others' (a-para-dāra-gamana). In the former case the translation wife' rather than 'wives' or 'women' has been chosen deliberately for reasens that will be apparent later, though in fact the issue of monogamy or polygamy continues to be debated in the texts, despite a social context in which polygamy is the natural perogative of the well-to-do. Some authorities hold that of the five aticāras listed below only the last three can be said to transgress this vow in its negative formulation.

The traditional designations of these aticaras are:

- (i) intercourse with a woman temporarily taken to wife (ttvara-parigrhitā-gamana);
- (ii) intercourse with an unmarried woman (a-parigrhitā-gamana);
- (iii) love-play (ananga-kridā);
- (iv) match-making (para-vivāha-karana);
- (v) excessive predilection for the pleasures of the senses (kāma-bhoga-tivrābhilāsa).

For the third and fourth atteāras the designations may be said to be invariable and the interpretation substantially the same. Under varying labels two quite separate views on the meaning of the fifth are apparent. Most of the earlier Svetāmbaras—and it would seem from the wording of the Upāsaka-dašāḥ itself that their interpretation is nearer to the intention of the canon-hold that it refers to the pleasures that can be obtained from the eye and ear and the senses of taste, smell, and touch. This is the view offered by Abhayadeva, 1 Devagupta, and Yasodeva; and it is favoured as an alternative by Municandra. Haribhadra2 had used it in combination with the second interpretation (favoured by the later Svetāmbaras and all Digambaras) that the aticara merely refers to excessive venery. It is in the treatment of the first and second aticaras that most uncertainty, sometimes provoked by textual variants, prevails. Samantabhadra3 and Aśadhara are noteworthy as the exponents of an aberrant tradition that fuses these two transgressions into one and inserts in the missing space of the table a totally novel item vitatva (obscene language).

&lt;sup>1</sup> The translation 'androgyne' rather than 'neuter' seems to respond best to the usage of the Jaina texts

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Jann Pryshukt, La Grande Déene (Para, 1950), p. 182. Entre la Grande Mier et le deus apprine, père de tous lei tire, on transe une devinit intermédiare androgyne Or le prêtre est simblable au deux. On ne duit donc pas être surpris dermicostrer à côté de la Viena bremphotolet. « de prêtre bissenoit on supposé tels ... Le deurs étament comudérés comme des androgynes. Il est possible qu'en théorie tout demis du titre andronyene.

Naturally the first and second atcaras cannot apply to women. To rob a co-wife of a night with the husband that should properly be hers, to make advances to her husband when he has taken a yow of brahmacarva, or-though this would more properly be considered a bhanga-to take a lover are named as offences that may be substituted for them. The distinction of sva-dara-santosa and para-dara-virati is of course only valid for men.4 Except for Asadharas no Digambara writer makes reference to aticaras committed by women.

Siddhasena Ganin,6 in a definition that imposes a harsh precision on ideas in which animistic concepts are fused, classifies maithuna as animate (sa-cetana) and manimate (acetana)

- Sa-cetana. (i) of a man, with a female (celestial, human, or animal),
  - (11) of a man, with another man or with an androgyne. This includes masturbation as well as homosexuality.
  - (iii) masturbation by a woman or use of a plant root as an artificial phallus.

Acetana. (1) of a man, with the statue of a woman (celestial, human, or animal) fashioned in plaster, wood, stone, or leather, or in the form of a painting;

```
P(A) 16
                         <sup>2</sup> Åv (H), p 825b
                                                        3 RK m. 14.
· YS III. 94 (p 558)
                         5 SDhA iv. 58
                                              6 T (S) vu. 11 (p 78).
```

- (ii) with other inanimate objects such as the current of a stream or clay,
- (iii) of a woman, with an inanimate phallus of wood or with other artificial devices.

The introduction of the concepts sa-cetana and acetana into the content of this anu-erata seems to be an innovation as it does not appear in the main stream of the Setämbara commentaries, but it recurs among the Digambaras, and Amitagati, for example, refers to females, human, animal, and inanimate.

- (1) ITVARA-PARIGRHITÄ-GAMANA. The first element of the compound raises numerous difficulties. Siddhasena Ganin<sup>2</sup> offers two explanations: either itvarā (itvarī, itvarīkā) signifies a harlot or else the word is used elliptically for itvara-kālam, implying a woman taken for a short time. In any event he regards the aticara as prohibiting intercourse with a prostitute if she is being kept by one man since for a limited period she has ceased to be common property. Haribhadra,3 too, favours the interpretation 'a kept woman', and Abhayadeva, Yasodeva, Hemacandra, and Siddhasena Sūrı take the same view. This transgression has the character of an aticara, being both a bhanga because the kept woman, in the mind of her lover, has become his property and been assimilated to the status of a temporary wife, and yet not a bhanga since she will in fact revert to being a prostitute when her temporary contract expires.4 Āśādhara,5 who calls this offence itvarikā-gamana, follows closely the explanations of Hemacandra but extends the meaning of stvarska to include any woman who has become 'ownerless' through the loss of her husband and who leads a disorderly life. The parallel offence in Samantabhadra's list seems from Prabhacandra's comment to refer to intercourse with any unchaste woman, For Camundaraya,7 and presumably for the other Digambara authorities who distinguish this aticara from the next, it refers simply to the frequentation of prostitutes.
- (ii) A-PARIGBHITA-GAMANA. For Siddhasena Ganin<sup>8</sup> this designation covers intercourse with any 'ownerless' woman whether she be a whore, or a married woman whose husband is absent, or any other woman outside the control of her family. The same acceptation is given to the term by Haribhadra, Abhayadeva,

```
<sup>1</sup> Śr (A) x11. 77.

• YŚ 111. 94 (p. 555).
```

&lt;sup>2</sup> T (S) vii. 23 (p. 108)

&lt;sup>3</sup> Äv (H), р. 825а. <sup>6</sup> RK ш. 14.

&lt;sup>7</sup> CS, p 6.

&lt;sup>5</sup> SDhA 1v 58. <sup>8</sup> T (S) vn. 23 (p. 108)

Yaśodeva, Hemacandra, and Suddhasena Sūri. It is an aticāra of va-dāra-santoja. A Digambara interpretation is available only from Cāmunḍarāya, who holds that this offence is committed with an 'ownerless' woman who is a wanton. Devendra-understands by a-parghtiā' a widow'.

(iii) ANANGA-KRIDA, Siddhasena Ganin's explanation of this seems to overlap with the following atuara. He understands by it a combination of methods to heighten sexual passion; the use of artificial phalli made of wood, leather, clay, and other constituents, caressing the sexual organs, pulling the hair, biting and marking with the nails Such practices he says, result in disease for the persons who give way to them. Haribhadra's definition is virtually the same; caressing a woman after costus in order to re-inflame desire, and with Abhavadevas he offers in addition an alternative interpretation toying (krīdā) with parts of the body-the breasts, loins, armoits or face-other than the sexual organs (literally an-anga 'not the organ'); Hemacandra and Siddhasena Sūrı leave the choice open between this second version and that of Siddhasena Ganin. This offence may be regarded as an aticara not a bhanga because it refers to caresses and love-play, and not to the complete sexual act.6 The Digambara authorities, including in this case Asadhara,7 understand this aticara to include various sexual deviations, particularly fellatio and cunnilinguism.

(w) KAMA-BHOGA-TIVRABHLIASA. The conventional Svetambara description of this offence visualizes a man who abandons all other thoughts and occupations in order to concentrate his every energy on the satisfaction of his sevual desires, and when his virility fails him has recourse to aphrodisiases in the hope of attaining the potency of a stallion or bull clephant. Such is the explanation furnished in almost identical language by Siddhasean Ganin, Hemacandra, Suddhasean Süri, and Asadhara. But as has already been noted this concept does not seem to be the most original. Haribhadra explains that kāma means the senses of sight and hearing and bloga those of taste, smell, and touch; the atteatar would therefore amount to 'an excessive propensity for the pleasures afforded by the five senses', but these lead on to the inflaming of passion' by using the nails or tech to lotus leaves and by taking aphrodisiacs or by caressing the woman's pudenda'. This is also the view of Abhayadeva' and Yaśodeva, who point out that the vow of swa-dira-santose implies that copulation should never be prolonged once desire is appeased. The vow is sullied if a man seeks to prolong his gratification by the use of aphrodisiacs or of the methods taught in the häma-lästras. Apart from Āšādhara the Digambaras, who prefer the designation häma-tivaöhimuseia (or in Samantabhadra's case "upilu-trṣā), regard the atidara as 'an excessive manifestation of sexual passion.' Devendra' understands by this 'lip-biting and other love-play' or else the 84 poses of Vätsväyana.

&lt;sup>1</sup> CS, p 6 <sup>2</sup> Åv (H), p 825a <sup>3</sup> P(A) 16 <sup>4</sup> Åv (H), p 825a <sup>5</sup> P(A) 16 <sup>6</sup> YS 11, 94.

(v) PARA-VIVAHA-KARANA, Siddhasena Ganin, 5 noting that the abstention from this implied in the taking of the vrata may seem strange since a householder must of necessity marry off his children. finds an analogy in the duality of the vow itself. A layman promises by sva-dāra-santosa to abstain from the enjoyment of all women save his own wife; similarly he is to abstain from arranging the marriages of other people's offspring but not of his own. The use of the word para implies, says Haribhadra,6 that he is actuated by a relationship of affection or by desire for the bride-price (kanvāphala) Abhavadeva7 further comments that the question of brideprice does not arise for a person of right faith whilst an unbeliever will not have taken the yows. However, he must ensure that his own daughters are married off since otherwise they would be led into evil courses. Abhayadeva also notes the view held by some authorities that this aticara implies an obligation to monogamy since it excludes a second marriage (para-vivāha) of oneself: in fact the very phrase sva-dāra-santosa would indicate that to take a second wife implies dissatisfaction with the first.8 Hemacandra9 and Siddhasena Sūri, summarizing all the preceding considerations, emphasize that in the case of one's children to marry them represents the lesser of two evils. There is an element of fault in it, but to neglect to do so would be worse still. In general, para-vivāhakarana is a bhanga if one has in mind that its result is copulation. but not a bhairea if one thinks of it only as a ceremony. Devendrato interprets para as parakiva 'those belonging to others' and so by

C 787

&lt;sup>1</sup> P (A) 15.
<sup>2</sup> P (Y) v 16.
<sup>3</sup> CS, p. 7.
<sup>5</sup> T (S) vu. 23 (p. 108).
<sup>6</sup> Av (H), p. 825b.
<sup>7</sup> P (A) 16.
<sup>8</sup> Ibid (p. 26)
<sup>9</sup> YS n1 94 (p. 556).

definition excludes from the atacāra the marrying of one's own children. In this he is in accord with the Digambara tradition as explicitly stated by Pūyapāda,' and implied by Cāmunḍarāya. Ašādhara' follows the detail of Hemacandra's explanations. The Avadyaka Cūrni' has evidently preserved a very ancient tradition when it relates this atacāra to beasts as well as to men. Thus to say 'let the bull be released in the go-dhana' would be to transgress the crata in the same way as if one said 'let the nubile girl be wedded'. Later writers treat such advice as a contravention of the goarthwalmanatara.

Stddhasena Ganire notes a variant reading for the Tattwārthawhich would lay down the first two atteāras to be itvaribāgamana and parighitāparighitā-gamana. The former would then apply to intercourse with a low or contemptible woman (kutistaamkirina-youl) explamed as 'one who is mentally or physically defective or who has entered the religious life'; it is reprehensible because it might incur punishment from the ruler and disparagement from the public. The second atteāra would then be 'intercourse with a prostitute or with a married woman separated from her husband'.

There is some uncertainty as to which atteāras belong to svadāra-santora and which to pāra-dāra-eviati, though by general agreement the last three are common to both. As to the first two offences, three different opinions' prevail

- That both are atteāras of sva-dāra-santosa but not of paradāra-virati this is often referred to as 'Haribhadra Sūri's opinion'.6
- That the first is an aticara only of para-dara-virati and the second only of sva-dara-santosa.
- That both are aticār as of para-dāra-virati but not of sva-dārasantosa. The authority for this is a Prakrit verse quoted in the Śrāvaka-dharma-pañcāsaka.

para-dara-vajjino pañca honti tinni u sa-dăra-santutthe itthie tinni pañca va bhanga-vigappehim avyārā

This view, like the first, is at least as old as the Avasyaka Curni.?

```
<sup>1</sup> T (P) v<sub>11</sub> 28

<sup>4</sup> T (S) v<sub>11</sub> 23 (p. 109)

<sup>5</sup> PS 277 (p 73)

<sup>2</sup> SDhA <sub>1</sub>v 58.

<sup>1</sup> Åv Cū, pt 11, p. 292

<sup>8</sup> YS m. 94 (p. 557).

<sup>7</sup> Åv Cū, pt 11, p. 291
```

As has been noted elsewhere, all sexual intercourse is to be condemned. At best, in the words of Yasodeva, a layman may be permitted, if he cannot resist the sex urge but being fearful of sin (pāpa-bhīru) does not wish to be unchaste, to have recourse to a limited use of his own wife. Aśādhara2 concedes that if he fails to be convinced that meditation and not copulation is the remedy for the disease of lust he may seek such satisfaction. The fever of concupiscence is no more quenched by satisfaction, says Hemacandra,3 than fire is extinguished by oblations of ghee. The concession may in the general view of the acarvas go further than the use of one's wife and include recourse to prostitutes, but an anyastri (a married woman, or an unmarried girl in the care of her parents) must always be left alone.

Enjoyment of women betakes of the nature of affliction because like fever it brings on thirst, and delirium, and exhaustion of the body. The passionate pleasure of the encounter can give no real satisfaction.4 Two reasons5 are alleged as a basis for the condemnation of all carnal contact, that in a moral sense the calm of the soul is disturbed by the increase of the passions of love and hate; and that in a physical sense the sexual act is always accompanied by himsā.6 The second is the expression of a concept which goes back to the canonical texts7 and on which the Digambaras particularly expatiate, adducing it in support of the contention that a woman cannot attain moksa in this life. It is held that there are always present in the navel, armpits, and pudenda of a woman myriads of minute living creatures of which large numbers perish during every act of costus. Thus Amrtacandra8 likens the act to the introduction of a heated iron bar into a tube containing grains of sesamum and adds that it has similar destructive results. Ananga-krida multiplies the risk of himsā. The Svetāmbaras who recognize the possibility of stri-mukts do not often touch on this subject, which, however, finds a place in Hemacandra's exposition of the brahmavrata. Concerned as often in other places to seek support for the monis sacro sacramento, 'Non desunt ex doctoribus catholicis qui doceant actum conjugalem non posse absque culpa saltem vensals exerceri.' * PASU 108.

<sup>1</sup> P(Y) 15. 2 SDhA iv. 51. 3 VS 11 81.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid. 55. 4 SDhA iv. 53-54 It is curious to note that Jamism concurs with Christianity in condemning for a very different motivation, all sexual intercourse Cf. De Sanchez, De matri-

See Schubring, Das Mahanisiha-Sutta, p. 70.

º YS 11. 79.

Jama concept in outside sources, he quotes Vätsyäyana's Kämasütra for the statement that 'tiny worms generated in the blood are to be found in a woman's sexual organs where they produce an itching'. For this apparent attempt at rationalization there would seem to be no justification in the earlier text.

A distinction is sometimes made between sthild-maithina and inkima-maithina. According to a definition that comes from a late authority? the former is enjoyment of women, human or celestial, in mind, word, or action whilst the latter implies a slight exciting of the sense-organs under the stimulus of desire.

From the oldest stratum of Jainism comes the injunction to avoid, as the Śrāvāka-prajūapt' puts it, 'the delusive sight of the bodies of women'. Devagupta and his commentator Yaśodeva* mention a special yatanā or striving for those who seek to perfect the bahma-trata:

chann'-anga-damsane phāsane ya go-mutta-gahana-ku-ssumine jayanā savvattha kare indiya-avaloyane ca tahā

In other words a man should never stare at, or touch, the sexual organs of a woman or vice versa. Against the background of a pantheistic concept of the universe this interdiction is naturally extended to the animal creation. It is therefore forbidden to stimulate a cow to unimate by rubbing its vagins; the urne should be collected when it is discharged naturally. Again, when a seminal emission occurs during sleep the mind should be concentrated in meditation on the sacred doctrine after recitation of the pañca-namakōra.

Amongst the Digambara writers who do not detail the atteāras of the brahma-trata Kārttikeya' defines it as 'regarding the wife of another as one's own sister or daughter and realizing that the bodies of women are full of impurity and that beauty and charm can only dedude the mid' For Vasunandine' it implies the complete renunciation of ananga-brida and the abstinence from sexual relations during the parram days. The arrows of Kāmadeva are, he says, fatal to a rightenous life.

As will have become evident, the attears of this vrata cover most aspects of sexual deviations. Adultery (para-dāra) and fornication

YS 11 80.
 SrPr 274
 Sr (V) 211
 Ratnašekhara on Śrāddha-pratikramana-sūtra, 15.
 P (Y) 17 (p 72)
 KA 337-8.

(veśvā) also figure among the seven vvasanas and are treated at length under that head in the popular literature. But the offence which incurs the keenest reprobation does not figure in any category. From the earliest days of Jainism there is evident an almost obsessional horror of incest. Thus Haribhadra,1 repeating the words of the Avasvaka Cūrni, says that if the brahma-vrata were not enforced there would be a grave danger of a man having carnal connexion with his mother or sister or daughter through unrestrained lust. A series of cautionary tales to drive home this point are recounted by almost every writer on śrāvakācāra and any reference to marriage makes exogamy mandatory.

THE APARIGRAHA, VRATA

THIS yow of non-attachment which alone of the anu-tratas has no correspondent among the mahā-vratas of monks refers both to internal (abhyantara) and external (bahya) parigraha. There are fourteen varieties of the former which are listed by Amrtacandra.2 Somadeva, and Asadhara among the Digambaras and by Siddhasena Ganin<sup>3</sup> among the Svetambaras. They are in fact largely irrelevant to the consideration of the vrata, but for the sake of completeness will be noted here (they of course comprise the kasāvas and no-kasāvas):

- (1) false belief (mith
  - vātva);
- (2) anger (krodha), (3) pride (māna);
- (4) deceit (māvā),
- (5) greed (lobha); (6) sense of the absurd
- (hāsva);
- (7) pleasure (rati);

- (8) displeasure, dejection (arati):
- (9) fear (bhaya); (10) sorrow (śoka);
- (11) disgust(jugupsā),
- (12) male sex urge (pum-veda);
- (13) female sex urge (stri-veda); (14) androgyne sex urge (napum-
- saka-veda).

It is with the ten or (in the more current enumeration) nine external objects of parignaha that the vow is concerned. These are:

&lt;sup>1</sup> Åv (H), p 823b.

<sup>2</sup> PASU 116.

<sup>3</sup> T (S) vu. 24.

Svetāmbara <sup>i</sup>	Digambara <sup>2</sup>
(1) land (ksetra),	<ol><li>land (ksetra);</li></ol>
(2) houses (vāstu);	<ul><li>(2) houses (vāstu);</li></ul>
(3) silver (hiranya);	<li>(3) gold coins (hrranya);</li>
(4) gold (suvarna);	<ul><li>(4) gold (suvarna);</li></ul>
(5) diverse commodities	(5) livestock (dhana),
(dhana),

(6) grain (dhānya); (6) grain (dhānya), (7) servants and birds (7) maidservants (dāsi),<sup>3</sup>

(7) servants and birds
(dvipada);
(8) livestock (catuspada),
(9) furniture (kubva),
(9) cloth (kubva),

Detailed classifications of all these types of possessions drawn from the canonical literature are found in almost all the Svetām-har authorities and although they seem to have no direct relation with the interpretation of the vrata they will be enumerated here. The oldest distinction is that of sautta (animate) and actita (inanimate) objects.<sup>5</sup>

(10) beds (śavyāsana).

- 1 Land, this is of three types
- (a) setu-kṣetra—land irrigated artificially by norias (araghatta) or other means.
- (b) ketu-ksetra—dry farming land depending on rain,
   (c) misra—irrigated land which also receives rain.
- 2. Houses, again of three types
- (a) excavated (khāta),
- (b) raised (ucchrita)
- (c) a combination of both (khātocchrita)
- The unanimous testimony of the Svetāmbara texts interprets hiraņya as 'silver, minted or unminted' and, in fact, the later works from Devendra's Srāddha-dina-kriya6 onwards replace hiraṇya by less ambiguous terms. For the Digambara ācāryas it seems always to have meant 'coins whether of gold or silver'.

4. There is no hesitation in the interpretation of the word as

4. There is no hesitation in the interpretation of the word as 'gold', for the Digambaras 'unminted,' for the Svetāmbaras 'minted or unminted'.

5. The Śvetāmbaras, giving a very broad sense to  $\it dhana$ , class it into four categories:

- (a) What can be counted (ganuma): such as nutmegs (jāti-phala), betel nuts (pūga-phala);
- (b) What can be contained (dharima) such as saffron (kunkuma), molasses (guda);
- (c) What can be measured (meya): such as salt, ghee, oil;
- (d) What can be divided up (pāricchedya): such as gems and cloth.
- 6 There is no unanimity on the number of varieties of dhānya: the earlier Švetāmbaras name seven or eight sorts, Hemacandra and Siddhasena Sūrī fix the figure at seventeen, whilst Devendra (and with him later writers such as Ratnaśckhara and Yaśovijaya) prefers a list of twenty-four drawn from the Daiavaikālikanryukti. Here is Hemacandra's list-2
  - (a) rice (vrihi), (j) Italian millet, Panicum italicum (priyangu);
  - (b) barley (yava); (k) the grain Paspalum scrabiculatum (kodrava):
  - (c) lentils (masūra); (l) hemp (sana);
  - (d) wheat (godhūma); (m) a kind of pulse (kalāya); (e) the pulse Phaseolus (n) the pulse Dolichos uniflorus Mungo (mudga); (kulattha);
  - (f) the pulse Phaseolus (o) the pulse Phaseolus acomtiradiatus (māsa): foltus (makustā):
  - (g) sesamum (tila);(p) rice (šāli);
  - (h) the grain Panicum milia- (q) the pulse Cajanus indicus ceum (aṇava); (ādhaki).
  - (i) chickpeas (caṇaka);

7 and 8. Dvipada is generally taken to include all the members of the household (wives, slaves, servants) and also domesticated birds such as parrots or peacocks. The oldest texts, for example, the Avaiyaka Cūrņī¹ mention alongside dvipada and catuspāda a category of apada objects including carts and trees. Carts figure at a much later date in the dvapdac class of the Śrāddha-dina-hrtya,³ inappropriately in the context as they cannot be said to propagate themselves.

9. Kupya is used by the Svetämbaras' to mean household chattels (grhopaikāra) made of iron, copper, brass, tin, lead, earthenware, bamboo, or wood, such as pots and pans, buckets, beds, chairs. It also includes carts and ploughs. The Digambaras' seem to understand the expression to mean what might be called luxury goods sandal(candana), silk(kiauma), cotton cloth(karpāra), silk dresses (bauleva).

Ratnasekhara, who is later than the period we are discussing, recalls a classification of the householder's property from the Dajavankālka-niryukti where six categories are distinguished

- dhānva—of which there are twenty-four kinds,
- (a) ratna—a comprehensive list again of twenty-four kindsgold, silver, brass, tin, rion, lead, minted coins, semi-precious stones, diamonds, precious stones, pearls, coral, conches, aloe wood, sandalwood, cotton cloth, woollen cloth, timber, hides, wory, yaks' tals, perfumes, and resin (dravyausadha);
- (3) sthāvara—the three kinds of immovable property are: land (presumably arable land), houses, and orchard land (tarugana explained as 'groves of coconut and similar trees'),
- (4) dvipada—there are two kinds of bipeds: human beings and two-wheeled carts:
- (5) catuspada—ten varieties of livestock are listed as quadrupeds: oxen, buffaloes, camels, goats, sheep, thoroughbred horses (atva, 1.e. jätya), ordinary horses (ghotaka, i.e. ajätya), mules, asses, and elephants,
- (6) kupya—implements and utensils of various kinds, no figure being given.

In the traditional Svetāmbara view the aticaras of this vrata are:

 exceeding the limits set for land and houses by incorporation (yojanena ksetra-vāstu-pramānātikrama);

- (ii) exceeding the limits set for gold and silver by donation (pradānena hıranya-suvarņa pramānātikrama);
- (iii) exceeding the limits set for grain and other foodstuffs by packaging together (bandhanena dhana-dhānya-pramānātskrama);
- (iv) exceeding the limits set for bipeds and quadrupeds by natural reproduction (kāranena dvipada-catuspada-pramāṇātikrama):
- (v) exceeding the limits set for household chattels by combination (bhāvena kupya-pramānātikrama),

All these aticāras consist in using various expedients to circumvent the interdictions which devolve from a man's self-imposed restrictions on the extent of his property. Any overt breach of this vrata which is a form of pratyālhyāna would constitute a bhanga.

For those Śvetāmbara writers who are influenced by the Tātiwā tha-stūtra—Siddhasena Gaṇin¹ and Haribhadra—and in general for the Digambara authorities, the atacāras imply no more than wilfully exceeding the limits set for the nine categories of possessions ranged under the five heads above. Samantabhadra,² though aware of these categories, has established a totally novel series of aticāras:

- att-vāhana—out of greed of gain driving oxen or other beasts of burden for a greater distance than they can comfortably go;
- (11) ati-samgraha—hoarding of grain or other commodities in the hope of making a very high profit, so as to obtain a big return on capital;
- (iii) ati-vismaya—extreme disappointment at having sold something at a price involving a loss;
- (iv) att-lobha—excessive greed expressed in wishing for a higher price when a good price has been obtained;
- (v) ati-bhăra-vahana—overloading of beasts of burden through greed of gain.

More than any other similar provisions of the moral code these ateāras are designed exclusively for the trading community; and the fact that the last of them is little more than a repetition of the fifth atiāra of the ahimā-wrata emphasizes their secondary character. In fact Samantabhadra's innovation in this field was imitated by none of his successors except Sakalakirti. Returning to the original enumeration of the alicaras we find the following elucidations in the commentators:

- (i) YOJANENA KSETRA-VÄSTU-PRAMÄNÄTIRRAMA. The assumption is that a man has taken a vow of pratyäkhyäma that he will not possess more than a given number of houses or fields. Suppose then, for example, that he acquires an additional field; and to avoid breaking the letter of his undertaking incorporates this with a field already in his ownership by removing a boundary fence. Though he will still have the same number of fields he will have committed an aftera but not a bhanga of his vow.
- (ii) PRADÂNENA HIRANYA-SUVARNA-PRAMÂNÂTIKRAMA. In this case if a man, perhaps as a gift from a satisfied prince acquires gold or silver in excess of the limits which he has imposed on himself, for a period of say four months, he may give it to a third party—to his wife, for example—on the understanding that he will get it back when the time limit of his pratyābhyāma has passed. Here again he will not have broken the letter of his vow but will, all the same, have committed an atical.
- (iii) BANDHANNA DHANA-DHÄNYA-FRAMÄNÄTIKRAMA. Suppose that someone has imposed on himself pratyākhyāna in respect of the acquisition of grain and other commodities for a period of four months, but is about to receive additional stocks. If he then goes along and has these tied up in bundles with ropes and leaves them where they are until he has sold the stocks already on his premises he will in a similar way have been guilty of an attatra.
- (w) KÄRANENA DVIPADA-CATUŞPADA-PRAMĀNĀTIKRAMA. Here it is assumed that a man has vowed not to increase his livestock, say, for a year. If they were allowed to breed freely in the meantime he would break the reata completely; accordingly he arranges that a cow, for example, will be in calf when the period of his pratyabhyama expires but will not actually have calved. Though there is thus a potential increase in numbers he will be only guilty of an attacar.
- (Y) BHĀVENA KUPYA-PRAMĀNĀTIKRAMA. If a man has undertaken to limit the number of his household utensils and later acquires additional ones he will be gulty of an aticāra if, to keep the numbers the same, he has some of them welded together, two by two. On the subject of kupya an opinion is also recorded by the seventeenth-century writer Yasovijaya<sup>1</sup> that here the fictitious pretext invoked is donation to a third party.

<sup>1</sup> e.g. P (A) 18, NPP 63; YS III. 06.

Certain writers devote themselves to an assessment of the nature of parigraha. The Digambaras explain it as mūrchā, the 'hallucination' of material possessions, and mūrchā in the definition of Amptacandra' is the development of acquisitive egotism (mamateu) arising from the operation of delusion (maha). In all forms of parigraha, internal and external, himsā is implicit. By a graduated progression the internal parigraha can be eliminated; whilst the external form, if it cannot be completely extripated, can at least be rendered as exiguous as possible. For Amitagati' every ārambha in the world stimulates parigraha, and conversely if this is curtailed harmful activity is reduced. Siddhasena Ganin's expatiates on the evil results to which mūrchā can lead, In lust for gain som will murder father, and brother brother. It is for this reason that men beat false witness and rolo on the highways.

THE DIG-VRATA

As has already been noted, the original Svetämbara grouping of the guna-wratus covers a certain number of long-term restraints whilst the iskna-wratus represent recurring exercises in self-discipline, but it is only the dig-wratu that is accorded an exact pendant among the latter: the deixaktisha-wratu, which in the Digambara lists is made to follow directly after it. Except in their temporal and snatial limits these two yows are identical.

The nomenclature of the aticāras of the dig-vrata is, to all intents and purposes, the same for Svetāmbaras and Digambaras:

- going beyond the limits in an upward direction (\(\bar{u}rdhva-dik-\) pramānātikrama);
- (ii) going beyond the limits in a downward direction (adho-dikpramānātikrama);
- (iii) going beyond the limits in a horizontal direction (trryag-dikpramāṇātikrama);
- (iv) expanding the limits of the area of movement (ksetra-vrddhi);
- (v) forgetfulness (smṛty-antardhāna).
  - Dharma-sangraha, 48.
    Sr (A) vi 75.
- <sup>2</sup> PASU m-28. <sup>4</sup> T (S) vii 12.

The fundamental idea of the vrata is to reduce quantitatively a man's sinful actions by circumscribing the area in which they can be committed. To express this, one simile, incorporated already in the Āvaiyaka Cūrnī, is repeated from author to author among the Svetāmbaras and is used by some Digambaras, notably Samanta-bhadra and Āsādhara:

tattāya-gola-kappo pamatta-jīvo 'mvāriya-ppasaro şavvattha kim na kujjā pāvam tak-kāraņānugao'

Like a heated iron sphere the layman will inestably, as a result of pramada, bring about the destruction of living creatures everywhere, whether he is walking, or eating, or sleeping, or working. The more his movements are restricted the fewer trasa-jivas and stheara-tivas will perish.

Although the primary effect of this virata is to curtail travel [Devagupta* expressly stipulates that certain roads are to be avoided in order not to destroy frogs) it has also a special association with the preceding anu-virata. Thus the Divadadamuprekia* emphasizes that the complete restraint thereby imposed makes it possible to extirpate lobba which is at the root of parigiala. Hemacandra* says that the dig-virata, by putting the acquisition of gold and silver and other wealth often out of a man's reach, will free him from the empire of greed, here chosen for an example, as the most tenacious of the papa-sthanas.

Let us turn back to the individual aticaras

- (i) ÜRDHVA-DIK-PRAMÄNĀTIKRAMA. As it is forbidden to ascend a mountain or to climb to the summit of a tree, a ban on all upward movement outside very narrow limits—perhaps within one's own house—would seem to be intended. Haribhadra's and Devagupta preserve a very primitive tradition found in the Avalyaka Cūrŋi: if a piece of jewellery is carried off by a monkey or a bird it is not permissible to transgress the limits one has imposed for oneself by climbing up to seek it, but if it is dropped one may retrieve it.
- (ii) Adno-dik-pramānātikrama. Again the limits appear to be set very narrowly. It is forbidden to descend into a well or the underground store of a village (grāma-bhām:-grha) if outside the limits fixed, even if something has been dropped there.

(iii) TIRYAG-DIR-PRAMANATIKRAMA. This for the Svetāmbaras applies to normal travelling in all directions, north, south, east, and west; and the boundaries are set fairly wide. (In the explanation of the fifth alicare a figure of a 100 yojanas is given by way of example.) Digambara writers' refer to the demarcation of limits by the position of well-known seas, rivers, forests, mountains, and states, and to measurement by yojanas. At the same time they seem to attempt to maintain a parallelism with the two preceding offences by citing as an instance of this alicare the act of entering a cave in a mountainside which is outside the limits set. In all three cases the transgression is an alicara if committed inadvertently, a bhanga if done deliberately.

(iv) KSETRA-VRDDHI. This is universally explained as an attempt to evade one's obligation by extending the limits in which freedom of movement is allowed.

(v) SMRTY-ANTARDHĀNA. Suppose that a man has set a limit through inattention and carclessness has forgotten the figure he had decided on. Uncertain whether it was 100 or 50, he hesitates. If he then goes outside the radius of 100 yojanas he will have committed a bhanga but owing to the state of mind induced by his uncertainty he will still be guilty of an aticāra if he exceeds 50 yojanas.<sup>2</sup>

The atnahara deal with the spatial but not the temporal limits of the varta, which by contrast with those of the destankatha-varta—a few hours or at most a day—are considerable: not less than four months (naturally, as later texts show, the four months of the rainy season are intended) or a year or for one's life long. In the Ratina-haraquia* the day-vrata is defined as the determination, by circumscribing one's range of movement, to desist from minor sin (anu-pāpa) until death, and the lifelong character of this form of pratyābhyāma seems implicit in certain other descriptions. Asādhara,*borrowing a phrase widely current to explain the significance of the sāmāyika-vrata, says that in the dig-vrata a layman becomes like an asectic (jāyate vatroad grh).

In view of the close relationship between the dig-vrata and the deśāvakāska-vrata it is perhaps surprising that the aticāras of one have not been transposed to the other. Yet the only instance of this seems to be found in the Śrāvaka-dharma-pañcāšaka¹ 'vajjai uddhāukkamam āṇayaṇa-ppesamobhaya-visuddham¹ where āṇayaṇa and preṣṇan are introduced from the debicakāšika-orata. Abhayadeva's commentary on these words—that they imply the fetching or sending for something—is absorbed into Hemacandra's² exhaustive description.

&lt;sup>1</sup> RK m 23. <sup>2</sup> P (A) 20. <sup>3</sup> Åv (H), p. 827a. <sup>4</sup> RK m, 22. <sup>5</sup> SDhA v. 3.

THE BHOGOPABHOGA-PARIMANA-VRATA

For this the older Svetāmbara writers prefer a designation inherited from the Upāsaka-dašāh upabhoga-paribhoga-parimāṇā- upabhoga—things used once or used internally such as food, flower garlands, betcl, cooling pastes, unguents, incense, or such acts as bathing;

pariblioga—things that can be used repeatedly or used externally such as houses, furniture, women, clothes, jeweilery, vehicles

If a modern term may be allowed to intrude here some items of the second category might roughly be classed as consumer durables. The words upabhoga and panibhoga are used with these meanings by all the Svetāmbara authorities except Hemacandra, and also in the Tativāmha-sūra and the Cātivīa-sūra. With Hemacandra and the Digambaras the concepts remain the same, but the label upabhoga is attached to things used repeatedly whilst things used once are styled bhoga. Exceptionally Somadeva and Vasunandin do not adopt the expression upabhoga at all but retain panibhoga for things used repeatedly and employ bhoga for things used once.

Two basic divisions of this wata are recognized by the Svetāmbaras * tt may refer to food caten or to occupations pursued. The second aspect, expressed in a ban on the pursuit of fifteen cruel trades, is unknown to the Digambaras except Aššdihara, * who for this theme is heavily indebted to Heimacandra. Other topics included at least by the Svetāmbaras under the bhogopabhoga-vrata are the anatie-Ašvas, the okhaksyas, and rātra-bhojana.

```
<sup>1</sup> P (SrDh), 20. <sup>2</sup> YS ni 97 <sup>2</sup> P (Y) 21 e g SrPr 285 <sup>5</sup> SDhA v 21-23.
```

As listed by the Svetāmbaras the aticaras are:

- (1) consuming sentient things (sacittāhāra);
- (ii) consuming what is connected with sentient things (sacittapratibaddhāhāra);
- (iii) consuming uncooked vegetable products (apakvausadhibhakṣaṇa);
- (iv) consuming partly cooked vegetable products (duspakvausadhi-bhaksana);
  - (v) consuming 'empty' vegetable products (tucchaŭṣadhi-bha-kṣaṇa).

For the third and fifth of these transgressions the Digambaras—and with them Haribhadra! (in the Dharma-bindu) and Hemacandra—substitute:

- (iii) consuming what is mixed with sentient things (sacitta-sammiśrāhāra);
- (v) consuming what has been conserved by fermentation (abhsava).

All these offences of course relate very narrowly to what is eaten. Amongst the Digambara Somadeva's has made some modifications in the list: thus the first atteāra refers to food that is prohibited (nisadāhā) and the fifth to food the preparation of which has not been personally supervised (avikinta).

Samantabhadra<sup>3</sup> has preferred to establish a completely different list in which the aticăras are given a much wider interpretation:

- lack of contempt for the poison of sensual pleasure (visayavisato 'nupeksā),
- (11) remembrance of it (anusmrti);
- (iii) excessive desire for it in the present (atilaulya);
- (iv) excessive desire for it in the future (atitrsa);
- (v) excessive enjoyment of it (atyanubhava).

Sakalakīrtí alone follows Samantabhadra in this classification of the  ${\it atic\bar{a}ras}.$

The conventional list of them shows certain divergencies of treatment:

- (i) SACITTÄHÄRA. The Śvetāmbaras define this as the eating
- <sup>2</sup> DhB 111 32.
  <sup>2</sup> Handiqui, p. 283
  <sup>3</sup> RK 111. 44.
  <sup>4</sup> YS 111. 98.

of sentient things, that is, those containing prthri-kāyas, ap-kāyas, or vanaspat-jīvas such as tubers (kanda) and roots (mūla) or frusts. Siddhasend Sanin's' commentary on the Tatroartha-sūtra adds to this concept a mention of ananta-kāyas. Cāmundarāya' understands by sacita sumply a vegetable organsım (harıta-kāya).

- (ii) SACITTA-PRATIBADDHÂHARA. Hatibhadra? explains this as the eating of, for example, ripe fruits which are attached to a tree. Abhayadeva' offers another interpretation. A person may put a fruit such as a date in his mouth with the intention of eating the flesh which is actita but not the stone which is sactita. Even if he eats only the flesh he will have committed an atteāra (not a bhairga) through this fact of putting it in his mouth. These two explanations are given by succeeding SvetImbara authorities and by Āsādhara. Siddhasena Ganun'e chooses a slightly different illustration' he instances the eating of jujubes (badara) or udumbara fruits which are full of seeds or pips. The Digambara view—that of Pijiyapāda' and Cāmundrafaya, for example—is that this attiāra implies the consumption of anything that has been in contact with or near to sentient things.
- (iii) APAKWAUSADHI-BHAKSANA Haribhadra' abstains from comment on this as unnecessary but records a variant reading (pāthāntana) sactita-sammirāhāna. Discussing the Srīzuha-dharma-pañādāha, Abhayadeva's notes that this and the two following attatāra refer to grain and pulses whilst the two preceding ones were concerned with fruit and roots. It may be asked why apakeausadhi-bhaksana is an attatāra fori the substance involved is actita no fault can be found with it and if actita it will already have been covered by the preceding attatāras. This offence has specifically the character of an attatāra on relation to the virata if it is done in the beliet that even if flour is not cooked the fact that it has been ground will have destroyed its sacitat element. The same view is expressed by Vašodeva and Siddhasena Sūr.
- (iv) DUSPAKVAUŞADHI-BIIAKSANA. For Haribhadra' and for Sıddhasena Ganın this means 'half-cooked grains or pulses' in which each individual grain, which may not have been cooked, will be sentient. Hemacandra' explains that it is because of the presence

```
      1 T (S) vn
      a CS, p 13.
      J Äv (H), p. 828b.

      4 P (A) 22.
      5 SDhA v 20.
      6 T (S) vii 30.

      7 T (P) vii 35.
      8 P (A) 22.
      9 YS iii. 98.
```

at the same time of the acitta cooked grains and the sacitta uncooked grains that the offence is an aticara. On the Digambara side Camundarava considers duspakvausadhi to mean 'cooked rice spoiled either by excessive moisture or because the grains in the centre are still raw'. Aśadhara2 explains that whether it is undercooked or over-cooked some grains will remain raw and therefore sentient.

- (v) TUCCHAUSADHI-BHAKSANA. The traditional definition of this, that of Haribhadra3 for example, is 'the eating of such grains and pulses as undeveloped mudga from which there is little satisfaction of hunger whilst at the same time much harm is done'. In this connexion Devaguota thinks of sugar-cane and other products which are unsatisfying even if eaten in quantity. Abhayadeva,4 Yasodeva, and Siddhasena Sūri note that if an 'empty' product were abakva or dusbakva there would be an aticara in any case; but, even if it is properly cooked, a person eating it will still have committed an aticara masmuch as he consumes it out of gourmandise after rendering it acitta by cooking, even though it does not serve the useful purpose of satisfying hunger. He will have kept the vrata in the letter whilst infringing it in the spirit
- (111) SACITTA-SAMMIŚRĀHĀRA, Siddhasena Ganins understands by this either the eating of sweetmeats (modaka) mixed with fruits, flowers, or sesamum seeds or the eating of food into which small living creatures such as ants, or kunthus have fallen, whilst Haribhadra3 suggests as an instance the eating of grain mixed with flowers Hemacandra6 mentions the consuming of a kind of cake (pūrana) mixed with ginger, pomegranate seeds, and other fruits or barley meal mixed with sesamum seeds and his examples are copied by Aśadhara.2 The Digambara7 writers understand by sacitta minute living creatures. For Camundarava sammisra is what has been mixed in such a way that it cannot be divided whilst sambaddha is what has merely been in contact with something else.
- (v) ABHISAVĀHĀRA. Siddhasena Ganins offers two explanations; either wine or spirits produced by the fermentation of various substances or the use of fortifying vegetable substances. Hemacandra6 has three: alcohol or soul gruel produced by fermentation; or the insertion of pieces of meat; or the use of a fortifiant derived from wine or honey or other vegetable products. Cămunţarāya¹ interprets as either sour gruel (sauxira) and similar products of fermentation or a stimulant (1973). Āšādhara² understands by it the immoderate consumption of liquids such as milk or rice gruel which strengthen the body.

C 757

<sup>1</sup> CS, p. 13. 2 SDhA v 20 3 Åv (H), p 828b. 6 YS III 98. 4 P (A) 22. 5 T (S) vii. 30. 7 T (P) vn. 35 ī

As has been pointed out the orthodox Svetāmbara' view is that the first two offences refer to such things as roots and fruits and the last three to the staple foods grains and pulses. The Digambaras', who employ a different terminology, do not appear to make this distinction but they recognize in each ativatar two elements of fault. Not only are sentient things consumed but the vigour of the sense organs (matrya-mada) is thereby stimulated, diseases arising from the wind humour may also be occasioned and there may be an element of sin in the remedies applied to counteract them. In any event the monk must avoid such food when seeking alms.

Cāmundarāya¹ has a fivefold division, built up from the less explicit model given by Pūjyapāda² and Samantabhadra,º of parbhoga and upabhoga to which he gives the common name of bhoga trusa-ghāta, pramāda, balni-radha, amista, amipasevya¹

- always to be avoided are things which involve the killing of living creatures that move (trasa-ghāta). Under this head come honey and meat,
- (ii) to be avoided in order to eliminate carelessness (pramāda) is alcohol which blurs the distinction between what should be done and what should not be done,
- (iii) better to be avoided in order to prevent much killing (bahrwadha) are the ananta-kāyas such as arjuna and ketaki flowers, unripe ginger, turmeric, radishes, or margosa flowers for when they are consumed there is great destruction but hitle profit;
- (iv) to be avoided in so far as they are undesirable (anista)? are vehicles, riding animals, ornaments, and similar luxuries Some are permissible but the rest are not permissible and should be eschewed.

 <sup>1</sup> CS, p 13
 2 SDhA v 20
 3 YS m 98.

 4 c g, CS, p 13
 3 T (P) vn 21
 6 RK m 38-40

 7 The late commentator Prabhācandra is probably mistaken in understanding by ameta 'food that is unwholcsome because it causes colic or other disorders'.

(v) not to be enjoyed (amupasevya) even though not undesirable. Deliberate abstention from such luxures as gaudy clothes and ornaments is recommended. If they are not abandoned for the duration of one's life their use should be restricted as far as possible for a limited period of time.

Amptacandra* insists that bhoga and upabhoga he at the root of huma. Bearing in mind his own capacity a wise man should eschew even those varieties which are not forbidden and should restrict those which he is unable to abandon altogether. Indeed should review continually his capacity for self-denial and if possible curtail further each day the limits already set. This of course is in the very spirit of the stories of the Upakaka-dakh.

The bhogopabhoga-parmänu-crata is of course, more conspicuously than any other erata, an expression of pratyākhyāna. Samantabhadra' uses the word to explain the two methods of self-restriction: myama and yama. The former is for a limited period fitime—a day, a night, a fortnight, a month, two months, six months, and may relate to a wide range of utilitarian or luxury articles 4 The latter term (apparently used only by the Digambaras) implies renunciation for one's life long.

The Śrāvaka-dharma-pārāzālaka' enunciates the bhogopabhogaparmāṇa-vrata as covering abstinence from the consumption of the ananta-kāyas, the udumbaras, and the atyangas. The last term (Prākrit accanga) has presented some difficulty to the commentators. Abhayadeva takes it to mean ether honey, alcohol, and meat or the practice of eating by night and use of garlands, sandal-paste, and similar substances, which are all described as occasioning excess of bhoga.

RĀTRI-BHOJANA

GREAT importance has always been attached by Jaina writers to the avoidance of taking food by night (rātn-bhojana). A passage of the Daśa-vankālika-sūtra gives to this abstention the status of a vow and on this authority Cāmuṇḍarāyao in the Cārtra-sāra makes &#x27; Prabhácandra explains as 'substances which even though prānuka are unfit for consumption by civilized people such as camel's milk, cow's urine, crushed shells, excrement, betel spittle'.

2 PASU 164-6.

3 RK m. 43

4 SDhA v. 14.

6 CS, p. 7.

it into a sixth anu-crata (being imitated in this by Sakalakirti) whilst Amptacandra' gives it in his *třacakārār the position that a sixth vow would have occupied. However, this sixth vow failed to obtain general recognition and no aticāra pentad was ever devised for it. For some Digambaras—Kārttikeya' and Samantabhadra, *for example—and in the *Avaiyaha Cūrri a-rātri-bhojana is the subject of the fifth *pratmā and even when this, as in the general Svetārn-bara view, is styled hāyotara-pratmā, forms still an important element in it. Again in certain enumerations—those of Amitagati and Aššādhara—it figures among the māla-guna: In general, however, in the *irācakācāra* the topic of rātri-bhojana is treated either under the ahumsā-virata or, since it is also counted as an abhakaya, under the partibhogopabhoga-parimāna-variba.

Samantabhadra3 defines abstention from ratri-bhoiana as the abandonment of the fourfold aliments by night out of compassion for living beings. Amrtacandra,4 who condemns this practice with especial vehemence, cites as arguments against it that there exist many tiny insects barely discernible by day which are completely invisible by night even when a lamp is lit, and that raea is always more intense in eating by night than in eating by day Camundaraya repeats Samantabhadra's definition and Vasunandin,5 like those ācāryas who place a-rātri-bhojana among the mūla-gunas, regards it as a prerequisite for the observance of the first pratima At night almost anything-moths, snakes, mice, bits of bones, skin, or hairs -may fall into a bowl of food, and the person who is eating will not be able to see them. And if he kindles a light moths and other tiny catur-inditya creatures will be dazzled and drop into the platter. However, as he refers expressly to 'threefold night-eating' Vasunandin6 would seem to admit that liquids may be consumed; and the Śrāvaka-dharma-dohaka7 expressly permits the taking of betel, medicines, and water during the night.

The Śvetāmbaras seem not to lay quite as much stress as the Digambaras on the avoidance of night eating, which receives only a bare mention under the parthogopabhogo-vrata in the Śrāvaka-dharma-pañcāiaka and the Nava-pada-prakwaṇa. Hemacandra, however, considers the subject of sufficient importance to devote to it a couple of dozen verses. § Four reasons are alleged for excludion ing eating by night: the food may have been contaminated by the touch of ptilacar or pretas or other evil spirits; it may be infested by minute invisible organisms such as hunthu and panaha; insects may have crawled or fluttered into it; and its contents will in any event be unrecognizable in the dark. To swallow an art in this way destroys the intelligence, afly makes one vomit, a louse causes dropsy, and a spider leprosy 3 Where food has to be cooked and the platters washed up there is even greater hunsa by night. The ban on eating by night, particularly on the consumption of mangoes and ghee, should also cover the first and last multifata of the day when the light is dim. 3 Addiction to rattre-biopiana entails rebirth as an owl or crow, or villure or cast, or prog or serpent, or lizard or scorpion.

For his condemnation of the practice of eating by night Hema-candra draws support lavishly from Hindu sources; from the Ayurvedic texts' for the quasi-medical reasons invoked, and in a more general sense from the mass of Hindu customary law and legends. Night, it is said, is a time of calamity when neither the oblation to fire, nor the offerings to the spirits of the ancestors, nor dāna, nor pājā are licit and when bathing is excluded, and it ill behoves a man therefore to eat during the hours of darkness.' Again it is traditional that in the morning the devas eat, at midday the risis, in the afternoon the pitrs, in the evening the data/yar and dainawas, and in the twilight the yaksas and rāksatas.'?

Ašādara* takes over all Hemacandra's arguments and at the same time agrees with Amttacandra' in classing tātri-hojona with the drinking of unfiltered water as a habit in which rāga is intense and which provokes great destruction of jiraz; both practices are also said to be responsible for disease. The best type of Jaina will eat once a day, the next best, twice, like an animal, whilst the least satisfactory type, comprehending nothing, east day and night making himself, in Hemacandra's phrase, 'a ruminant though devoid of horns and tail'. 10

Later Svetämbara writers such as Ratnaśckhara and Yaśovijsya quote largely from the Nisitha-cūrai in discussing rūtri-bhojana and dwell particularly on the assertion made there that if a grhagodhila (a kind of house lizard) gets into the food and its excretions : A handhi in described as a very mutus trifutrio spacet and a omeda seems to be an organism producing mould.

2 YS 111 50-12 3 Ibid 57. 4 Ibid 67.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid 60 6 Ibid SDhA 111. 11-15 9 PAS

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ibid 57. * Ibid. 67. <sup>6</sup> Ibid 56. * Ibid. 58–59. <sup>9</sup> PASU 130. * YS ui. 62.

or parts of its body are eaten a similar lizard will come into existence by spontaneous generation in the stomach of the eater.1

THE ABHAKSYAS

THE definitions of what is not fit to be eaten are given considerable prominence particularly in the later Jainism. The standard Svetämbara list of twenty-two abhaksyas is found as early as the Pravacana-sāroddhāra,2 It has largely ousted the later list of sixteen preferred by Hemacandra 3 Here are both enumerations.

(12) ice (karaka)	(12) food eaten at night
(13) earth (mrd)	(13) pulses with raw milk products
	(āma-go-rasa-samprkta- dvidala)
(14) food eaten at night (rātri-bhojana)	(14) rice that has fermented (puspitaudana)
(15) fruits with many seeds	(15) curds kept for more than two

- (bahu-bisa) (16) ananta-kāvas
- tita) (16) tainted food (kuthitänna)

HEMACANDRA

days (dadhy-ahar-dvitīyā-

(1-4) four banned vikitis

(5-9) five udumbaras

(II) unknown fruits

(10) ananta-kāyas

- (17) pickles (sandhāna) (18) buttermilk in tiny lumps
- (ghola-vataka)

NEMICANDRA

(6-q) four banned vikrtis

(1-5) five udumbaras

(10) snow (hima)

(11) poison (msa)

- (19) aubergines (vrntāka) (20) unknown fruits and flowers
- (21) 'empty' fruits (tuccha-phala)
- (22) tainted food (calita-rasa)

The basic identity of the two lists is at once apparent. If, as the Dharma-sumgraha, pt. 1, p. 73b. 2 PS, vv 245-6. These verses are probably older than Nemicandra. They are found again in the Caitya-vandana-kulaha of Jinadatta Süri and are quoted by almost every later writer who refers to the subject commentator says, ghola-vajtaka is an upalahşana for āma-go-rasasamprika-dendala and calita-rasa for puspitaudana and dadhy-ahardutijātila Hemacandra has no items that are not found in the longer list. However a list of twenty-five items consisting of Nemicandra's version with these two additions and a mention of śrigātaka (Trapa bispinsos) is sometimes found.

YS m 6-7

The relevant verses of the Pravacana-sāroddhāra are worth quoting.

pañe'-umbarı-cau-vıgai hıma-visa-karage ya savva-matţi ya rayani-bhoyanagam cıya bahu-biya-ananta-sandhānam ghola-vadā väyanganam amunya-nāmānı phulla-phalayānı tuccha-phalam caliya-rasam vajjaha vayjānı bāvisam

The udumbaras and vikrtis (abstinence from which is required for the observance of the mula-gunas), ratri-bhojana, and the anantakāvas are discussed separately. Of the other elements of the list snow and ice are forbidden because their consumption necessitates the destruction of ap-kayas whilst they are not essential to life like water itself.2 Poison is not to be taken even if its effect can be counteracted by mantras because it will in any event kill innumerable gandolaka organisms in the stomach and because if death ensues it may provoke great delusions in the last hours. Later writers, from the fifteenth century onwards, here mention opium (ahi-phena). Earth is prohibited because it contains prthvi-kāvas. because it may be a source of generation of trasa-nivas with the full five senses like frogs, and because it may cause intestinal maladies. Salt is expressly excluded from the abhaksvas as being essential to life but all other kinds of earth including chalk (khatika) are covered by the han. The bahu-bija class covers fruits like pomegranates in which there is a risk of destroying a jiva in each seed. By sandhana are meant pickles or preserves of bael and other fruits. Gholavataka is said to be used to cover ama-po-rasa-samprkta-dvidala (derdala being 'pulses which when ground yield no oil'); in it there are organisms so minute that they can be discerned only by a kevalin. Aubergines have aphrodisiac properties and provoke a tendency to sleep too much. Unidentified fruits and flowers are to he avoided for if they are forbidden it is wrong to consume them e.g in the Yoga-vndhi of Candra Süri

 The explanations in this paragraph are all taken from Siddhasena Süri's commentary on the above verses.

and if they are poisonous they will occasion loss of life. The expression tuccha-phala embraces also flowers, leaves, and roots, 'empty' because they do not satisfy hunger but cause much destruction of jinas. Examples of these are the bael fruits, and rose-apples, and the flowers of mahua, and Induan horse-radish. The term calita-rasa (food that has 'gone off') is meant to include by extension boild rice which has fernented and curds kept for more than forty-eight hours, these are to be rejected because living organisms have started to multuly in them.

Even if the twenty-two abhuktyus are listed for the first time in the Prawacana-sărodhbra their enumeration is adumbrated at a much earlier date. Haribhadra, relying on the Āvaiyaka Cūrni, situates them under the divisions of the caturwidhabra. Thus under aiana come meat and the ananta-kāyas, under pāra meatbroth and alcohol, under khādima the udumbara, and under radiam honcy. Devagupta adds to this embryo list butter, gholavataka, and rattr-bhagana. Yasodeva, who is posterior to Nemicandra, gives no formal enumeration but mentions the five udumbara, and pulses mixed with raw milk products (mugga-gayam āma-go-ras'-ummirus).

The Digambaras have not, at least during the period under review, defined with such precision the abhakyas. Amitagative numerates—rather surprisingly under the anartha-danda-erata sūrana-handa(an unanta-hāya)—curds kept for more than two days, boiled rice that safermented, drone flowers and hadrage flowers; and states that in general any ananta-hāya and any substance that is tainted and no longer fresh is to be avoided.

Āsādhara<sup>7</sup> gives a more extensive but unnumbered list which he subdivides under the infractions of the mūla-gunas. His abhaksyas, arranged in the order of the Svetāmbara list are:

```
(1-4) four banned vikrits
(5-9) five udambaras
(1c) water or other liquid in leather containers
(1) honey used as a collyrium
(madhu-vrata)

* Åv(H), p. 8286

* NPP 7c
```

(12) asafoetida (hingu) in contact with leather	(māmsa-vrata)
(13) any flowers such as those of mahua or marking-nut (bhallātaka)	(madhu-vrata)
(14) food eaten at night	,
(15) rice gruel that has fermented (puspitakāñjika)	(madya-vrata)
(v6) augusta käisaa	,

kārījīka) (madya-vrata)
(16) amanta-kāyas
(17) pickles (sandhāna) (madya-vrata)
(18) pods (sambi) such as rāja-māṣa (udumbara-vrata)

(19) aubergines (and jujubes, betel-nuts, & c.) unsplit (udumbara-vvata) (20) unknown fruits (udumbara-vvata) (21) curds kept for more than two days (madya-vrata)

(a2) tainted food (ryāpama-bhōya) (māmsa-vrata)
There is also an interdiction on esting mangoes, ghee, and a number of other foodstuffs in the last muhūrta of the day. Snow and ice, poison and earth are absent from this list; on the other hand Ašūhara includes articles that have been polluted by leather and also flowers (which take the place of empty fruits). Coupled with the abhādsiyas is the ban on unfiltered water.

Later Digambara lists closely follow Asadhara's pattern and make few noticeable additions to the objects forbidden.

There are rudimentary lists too in the Śrāraka-dharma-dohakaand the Yaisatilaka.<sup>2</sup> The former understands the abhaksyas to include nāli, siirana, milaka, laisuņa, and other ananta-kāyas, flowers, curds kept for more than two days, fermented rice, and all tainted food. Somadeva names ananta-kāyas and flowers.

THE ANANTA-KĀYAS

AMONGST the substances which a Jaina is forbidden to consume either as food or as medicine are included the ananta-käyas or xädkäranas, plants which are inhabited, not like the majority of the vegetable kingdom by individual jivas, but by an infinite number of living organisms. Where in the elementary bodies—earth, water, fire, wind—the individual jiva wraps itself up only in a tiny part of the material, in the plant bodies additional jivas may attach themselves to the original individual and adhere to it until its development process is complete. Those plants which are classified as nanta-käyas seem to be chosen because of certain morphological peculiarities such as the possession of bulbs or rhizomes or the habit of periodically shedding their leaves; and in general they are characterized by possibilities of vegetative reproduction.<sup>1</sup>

&lt;sup>1</sup> Doha 34-36. <sup>2</sup> Handiqui, p 264.

A list of 32 is already conventional by the time of Nemicandra<sup>2</sup> and is repeated by successive writers. It is contained in the following verses:

sawad hu kanda-gil siirun-kundo yu vaga-kando ya dada-habdak ya dada-habdak ya tahia dadam taha olla-kaccino adda-habdak ya tahia dadam taha olla-kaccino adda-habdak ya tahia dadam taha daha jama laha hama baka satikwat varili kumar taha taha inana lotho baka mamma kasala-patik kacengi tingga alla-mutha ya taha liban-uhba-halih khelluda-halih khelluda-halih khelluda-halih khelluda-halih khelluda-halih khelluda-halih khelluda mayu-valil ya mila taha bhimn-rasi vuruda taha dhukka-vuthulo padhamo sixyan-zuloy satikha pallanko kamil-ambilyi ya dili taha pindiki havanti e anantu-nimelan amma mantun muthum mutun lakhbama-uhiti samawi.

An attempt is made below to identify the individual plants

PRAKRII FORM	SANSKRIT FORM	BOTANICAL NAME	ENGLISH NAME
(1) sūrana-kanda	sūrana-kanda	Amorphophallus campanulatus Br.
(2) vajja-kanda	vajra-kanda	Synantherias vylva- tica Schott
(3) adda-halıddā	moist haridrā	Curcuma longa Roxb	turmeric
(4) adda	ārdraka	Zingiber officinale Roscoe	l limber
(3) alla-keccūra	moist kaccūra	Curcuma zedoaria Roscou
(6) sattāvarī	śatavari	Asparagus vace- masus Willd
(7) virālī	virālika		1
(8) kumārī	kumārī	Elettaria cardamo- mum Maton.	carda- mom

&lt;sup>1</sup> See J. F. Kohl, 'Pflanzen mit gemeinsatnen Korper nach der Lehre der Jainas' in Zeitschrift für Ethnologie (1953), Bd 78, pp 91 ff.

<sup>3</sup> The commentators sometimes consider the first item on the list of thirty-two to be sarvā handa-jāi (all sorts of plant growths rooting below the soil, unless in a dried state) in which case sūrana-kanda and vajra-kanda together form the second item.

P	RAKRIT FORM	Sanskrit form	BOTANICAL NAME	ENGLISH NAME
(9)	thoharī¹	snubī	Euphorbia nerisfolia
(10)	gıloî	guḍūcī	Tinospera cordifolia Miers.
	Ihasana	laśuna	Allium satieum Linn.	garlıc
	varpsa-karılla	shoots of vamsa	1	bamboo
(13)	gajjara	garjaraka	Daucus carota Linn.	carrot
(14)	lonaya2	lavanaka
	lodha <sup>3</sup>	lodhaka	ł
	gıri-kannı	gırı-karnıkă	} nature shoots of any kaseruga	kaśeruka	Scirpus kysoor Roxb.
	thugga	thega	Cyperus bulbosus
(,	alis-mutthä	moist mustă	Cyperus rotundus Lunn
(21)	lüna-rukkha- challı*	bark of lavaņa- vrksa		l
(22)	khelluda	khelluda	l .	-
(23)	amaya-vallı	amrta-vallı	1
(24)	mūla	mūlaka	Raphanus satuvus Linni	radish
		shrooms or other edib		1
(26)	viruba (virûdha)-	-sprouted pulses or	grains	1
(27)	dhakka-vatthula	tanka-västula	Feroma elephantum Correa
(28)	süyara-vallı6	sükara-vallı	1	(
(20)	pallanka	palyanka	Beta maritima Linn	beetroot
(30)	komal'-ambiliyā	ımmature ämlikä	Tamarındus ındıca Lınn.	tamarını
(31)	ālu <sup>7</sup>	āluka	Arum colocana	taro
(32)	pındālu	pıṇḍāluka	Droscorea globosa Roxb.
	ghosädankura	ghoşāţakī shoots	Luffa aegyptiaca Mill.
	karirankura	karîra shoots	Capparis aphylla Roth.	caper komala-tınduga	ımmature tınduka	Diospyros embryop- teris Pers.
	varunankura	varuna shoots	Crataeva Roxburghu	1
	vadankura	vata shoots	Ficus benyalensis	banyan
	nımbankura	nimba shoots	Melia azadirachta Linn.	margosa

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sometimes called vajra-taru <sup>2</sup> The ashes are said to yield natron.
<sup>2</sup> This is explained as padmini-kanda and is perhaps equivalent to the nāh of

This is explained as padmini-kanda and is perhaps equivalent to the nāh of some Digambara lists
Also called bhramara-vrkia.

An ananta-käya in its early stages but not when mature.
 Said to be so called because pige are used to discover it.

&#x27; Today this word tends to be given the meaning of 'potato'.

The unnumbered ananta-kāyas not included in the standard list of thirty-two are mentioned as early as the Pravacana-sāroddhāra.

Hemacandra, though he does not adopt the verses quoted above, gives virtually the same enumeration of the ananta-kayus. Of the thirty-two he omits virālika, vamia-karilla, garparaka, lavaṇaka, bhelluda, bhūmi-rasa, and tanka-vāstula, however, he mentions also five edible roots. grājina, mudgara, palāia-kanda, hasti-kanda, and manuva-kanda.

These Svetambara lists suffered from the disadvantage that they were not exhaustive and named only a few of those ananta-hāyas in the vegetable kingdom which might conceivably serve as food. The Digambaras have preferred to abide by a general classification given in a verse of the Mūlācāra* from which examples can be drawn at will.

mūl'agga-pora-bīa sāhā taha khanda-kandha-bīa-ruhā sammucchunā yā bhanıyā pattevānanta-kāyā ya

- (1) reproducing from the root (mūla-bīja), e.g. ārdraka, haridra:
- (2) ,, ,, tip (agra-bija), e g. ketaki (Pandanus oduratissimus Willd.);
- (3) ,, ,, nodules (parva-bija), e.g. 1ksu (sugar-cane), vetra,
- (4) ,, ,, branches (sakha-bīja);
- (5) ,, stem(skandha-bija), e.g. palaša, sallaki;
- (6) ,, ,, tubers (kanda-bija), e.g. sūrana, pmdālu, palāndu (onion),
- (7) ,, ,, seed (bija-1uha), e.g godhūma, šāli; (8) spontaneously generated (sammūrchima) 3

These plants, which are jointly inhabited by many jivas, have a common source of nourishment and when one perishes the many perish.

The concepts underlying the category of the ananta-kāyas have been convincingly explained by J. F. Kohl, who notes that the Jama concept is based on a thorough insight into plant physiology and morphology as is shown by the recognition of the role of roots and stems in the storage of reserves for future generations.

<sup>1</sup> YŠ 111 44-46 1 SDhA v 174: Lāfi-sankutā 11. 70 ff 2 Mūlācāra, 213.

<sup>4</sup> J F Kohl, op ett, and 'Enige Bemerkungen zur Zahlensymbolik und zum Animismis im botanischen System der Jaina-Kanon' in the Kirfel-Feitschrift (Bonn, 1955), pp. 132-3.

THE PROFESSIONS

As already noted the bhogopabhoga-vrata has two aspects; it may refer to food or to occupation. The fifteen trades! forbidden under this head are given in the Unasaka-daśah: they form a purely Svetambara category, being unnoticed, for example, in the Tattvārtha-sūtra. Āśādhara2 alone among Digambara writers has included them in his work in an evident borrowing from Hemacandra. The enumeration is as follows:

- livelihood from charcoal (angāra-karman).
- (2) livelihood from destroying plants (vana-karman);
- (2) livelihood from carts (śakata-karman).3 (4) livelihood from transport fees (bhātaka-karman);
- (5) livelihood from hewing and digging (sphota-karman);
- (6) trade in animal by-products (danta-vāniiva):
- (7) trade in lac and similar substances (lāksā-vāniīva);
- (8) trade in alcohol and forbidden foodstuffs (rasa-vānijya);
- (o) trade in men and animals (keśa-vāmiya);
- (10) trade in destructive articles (visa-vānijva);
- (11) work involving milling (vantra-pidana).
- (12) work involving mutilation (mrlanchana); (13) work involving the use of fire (davāgni-dāna);
- (14) work involving the use of water (sarah-śosana);
- (15) work involving breeding and rearing (asati-posana).

The designations remain virtually the same in all the literature but there are some noticeable divergencies in interpretation.

- 1. ANGARA-KARMAN. For Haribhadras this is the 'making, buying, and selling of charcoal'. Besides charcoal-burning this includes all occupations involving the use of kilns in which the six forms of living organisms (saj-jiva-nıkāva) may perish. Under this head come therefore the smelting of iron, the firing of pottery. the refining of gold or silver, the making of bricks and tiles, the construction of ovens for roasting chick-peas and other pulses, and in general any working in metals such as tin, copper, brass, bellmetal, or lead.<sup>1</sup>
- 1 These occupations are noticeably similar to those prohibited for a brahmin who maintains himself as a sudra See Yainavalkva-smrti, iii, 16-12
  - 2 SDhA v. 21-23.
- 3 Hoernle rightly noted that the third forbidden trade is apparently duplicated by the fourth. The acarvas are, however, unanimous in the explanation given and offer no support at all to his suggestion 'livelihood with clothes'. See UD ii. 29. 4 Åv (H), p. 829a.

- 2. VANA-KARMAN. Harbhadra² explains this as 'the purchase of a stand of trees and the felling and sale of the timber'. Hemacandra² defines it as the sale of timber, cut or uncut, and of the leaves, shoots and fruits of plants, whether cut or uncut. It also applies to the making of flour from grains and pulses by grinding between two stones (sida and sida-putraka) or by pounding in a mill (gharata). It is in the destruction of vanaspati-kāyas that the offence lies.
- 3. SAKATA-KARMAN. This includes the construction and sale of carts to be drawn by animals and the driving of them, whether done by onself or at one's instigation. The ban on such occupations would apply equally to the work of a wheelwright. Such trades are sinful because the use of a cart involves the harnessing and beating of the draught beasts and the crushing of living organisms by the animals' hooves and under the wheels as they move.'5
- 4. BHAŢAKA-KARMAN. "The conveying of merchandise in one's own vehicle or hiring out of draught animals to others for the same purpose' seems to be the original meaning. "Hemacandra" defines as 'making a livelihood by carting goods in vehicles or on horses, oxen, buffaloes, camels, mules, or asses: The same destruction of life as in the preceding case would be liable to occur.
- 5. SPHOTA-KARMAN. For Harbbadra<sup>8</sup> this is the cultivation of the soil with a plough or digging-stick. By Hamacandra<sup>5</sup>9 time the concept has been considerably expanded. He understands it to include the excavating of artificial pools, tanks, and wells, the ploughing of fields, the quarrying of rocks, and shaping of stone. Particularly in the work of cultivation the earth is mercilessly torn up and not only are printi-käyaw destroyed but also wanaspati-käyaw and trasa-jiraa. Asidhara<sup>10</sup> adds a further concept: the making and selling of fireworks. Devendra<sup>11</sup> would also include under this head the grinding of grains and pulses into flour (which is more generally held to fall under yantra-pidapa) and the mining of salt.

```
1 YS iii 102. 2 Åv (H), p. 829b 3 YS iii 103. 4 Ibid 104 5 SDhA v 21. 4 Åv (H), p. 829b. 7 YS iii 105 4 Åv (H), p. 829b. 9 YS iii 106. 9 YS iii 106.
```

- 6. DANTA-VĀNIJYA, Haribhadra, quoting the Anasyaka Curni. explains that traders bargain for every with the jungle tribes, who then hunt and kill elephants on the understanding that the dealers will come back and purchase it from them. They also make similar arrangements with fishermen for conch-shells. By buying products thus obtained from the slaughter of living beings they are directly provoking that slaughter. While Abhayadeva2 appears to confine the notion of danta to the by-products of the elephant Hemacandra3 explains that danta (ivory) is an upalaksana to indicate any animal by-products such as tail-hairs of vaks, claws of owls, bones i.e. shells of conches, pelts of antelopes or down of geese. Devendra+ adds to this list the scent glands of musk deer.
- 7. LAKSA-VANIIVA. Again here lāksā is an upalaksana designed to include red arsenic (manah-śilā), indigo, borax (tankana), dhātaki,5 and other substances, which have in common the property of serving as dvestuffs or colorants. Devendras mentions too in this connexion yellow orpiment. The objections to the use of and trade in them are based on various grounds. Red arsenic and borax as poisons would properly belong under visa-vānijva, the collection of red lac involves the destruction of endless numbers of tiny insects, dhātaki is reprehended because alcohol can be made from its bark and flowers and because its resin is full of insects, and the cultivation of indigo is said to be inseparable from the destruction of living beings 6
- 8. RASA-VĀNIJYA, From the Avasyaka Cūrni7 it would seem that originally the reference here was to the manufacture, sale, and consumption of alcohol, which is described as leading to brawling. squabbling, and murder. But for Hemacandra8 rasa in the sense of alcohol becomes an upalaksana to include honey, fat (obtained from meat), and butter, in other words the substances prohibited under the mula-guna category. Devendra+ adds a ban on trade in meat, milk, curds, and ghee,
- Keśa-vānijya. This is explained as trade in creatures that have hair. Haribhadrat understands by this the buying of slave girls in a place where they are cheap and selling them elsewhere to make a profit, which is reprehensible because it implies restricting

* Av (H), p 829b

<sup>4</sup> SrDK, pt. 11, p 108

* YS 111 108.

<sup>8</sup> Åv Cū, pt. 11, p. 297.

<sup>2</sup> P (A) 22 (p. 35). 3 YŚ 111, 107.

Woodfordia floribunda Salisb.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid 100

the liberty of others. Hemacandra' distinguishes carefully between this occupation, which affects living beings, human or animal, and danta-vāṇiya, which concerns only parts of animals. When bought and sold, animals are bound to suffer from beating and tying up and from humer and thirst.

- 10. VISA-VĀNIJYA. This implies a ban on trade in poisons such as aconite, weapons such as swords, mechanical devices such as noras, rom implements such as spades and ploughs, all of which are potentially dangerous to life <sup>2</sup> Hemacandra includes here yellow orpiment, which Devendra<sup>3</sup> more logically places under labia-a-damya.
- 11. YANTRA-PIDANA. This is deemed to be the operation of mills and presses for crushing sugar-cane and for expressing oil from sesamum seed, mustard seed, and castor-oil beans as well as the 'crushing' of water in norias. The destruction of life thereby provoked is so great that a popular saying (laukika) affirms that an oil-press is as evil as ten slaughterhouses. Devendra' includes here all trade in such articles as grindstones, pestles, and mortars.
- 12. NIRLANCHANA. Haribhadra<sup>6</sup> understands by this the gelding of bulls and other animals. Hemacandra<sup>7</sup> extends the meaning to cover the branding, docking, nose-piercing, and cutting off of the ears and devlaps of livestock.
- 13. DAVAGNI-DANA. Haribhadra interprets this on the basis of the Attayba Cârul as 'Setting fire to the meadows as is the custom in Uttarapatha, so that later on, when the raims come the grass may grow lashly. Hemacandra 'offers three explanations: either the carcless starting of woodland fires by foresters; or the kindling of fires out of piety in the dipotateae festival for a man's future weal at the hour of his death, or the system of predatory cultivation described by Haribhadra. In all cases there is very great loss of life.
- 14. SARAH-ŚOṢANA. 'This is explained as drawing off the water from lakes, tanks, and watercourses so that they dry up and can be sown with crops, thus all forms of aquatic life are destroyed.º
  - 15. ASATI-POSANA. For Haribhadra 10 this means the rearing of girls for prostitution as is the custom in the Gauda country, Hemacandra¹ supplements this to include the breeding and keeping of destructive animals and birds such as parrots, mynahs, peacocks, cocks, cats, dogs, and monkeys. Devendra² adds the further idea of rearing enunchs.

Although the Digambaras have not inherited the tradition of the fifteen forbidden trades they enforce some sumlar interdictions under other heads. In almost every text, for example, the ban on the keeping of destructive animals and birds is included in the himal-pradama division of anartha-dapda which also embraces everything that is understood by viga-võinjiya and lähkä-võinjiya. Samantabhadra'a and Cāimundarāya's subdivide the pappapadeia division of anartha-dapda into kleia-võinjiya (in which it would seem not unreasonable to dissern a false sanskritziation of a Prakrit kesa-võinjiya) and tiriyaj-võinjiya which together cover the ground of the ninth forbidden trade.

The eternal dilemma of Janusm in laying down an ethos for the layman has been well put by Āšūdhara. The lay estate, he says, cannot exist without activity and there can be no activity without the taking of life, in its grosser form this is to be avoided sedulously but the implicit part of it is hard to avoid. It follows that at least the keeping of animals and contact with any destructive implements are to be eschewed.<sup>5</sup>

At the same time certain Digambara milieux have undoubtedly widened the sphere of occupations open to a believing Jaina and may have consciously rejected some of the interdictions described above The Adi-purāṇa, for instance, makes provision for a man belonging to a caste which bears arms to retain them if essential to his livelihood.

In general, however, Digambaras and Svetambaras agree in admitting only a limited number of ways of earning one's luving: but ācāryar of the school of Jinasena' mention various forms of atritā defined as 'the pursuit of a profession in a pure way' which is itself regarded as one of the six daily karmans. The later Svetāmbaras from Ratnašekharas' onwards generally refer to seven licit upāyas:

SVETĀMBARA DIGAMBARA

(1) vānijya (trade)

(2) vidyā (practice of medicine) man (clerical occupations)
(3) krsi (agriculture) kṛu

vānirva

(3) Rrsi (agriculture) Rri (4) śilpa (artisanal crafts) śilpa-karman

(5) pāśupālya (animal husbandry) asi (military occupations)

(6) sevā (service of a ruler) (7) bluksā (mendicancy)

The Svetāmbara list is apparently designed to indicate a sequence of desirability. Trade is the best means of getting one's living whilst begging is the worst 'it represents a last resort for the blind and the crippled. Vidyā covers astrology and divination as well as chemistry and perfumery For kru the late Digambara work the Trawamhkātrar' suggests in preference to tilling the soil a form of métayage in which a Jaina business man would provide oxen, seed, and implements for others to use.

Five typical actions symbolizing the round of daily duties in the home are grouped together and styled the 'slaughter-houses' (stine) because they mevitably result in the destruction of living organisms. The following verse detailing them is quoted in Pra-bhācandra's commentary on the Ratina-hamada.

khandanī pesanī cullī uda-kumbhah pramārjanī pañca-sūnā grhusthasya tena moksam na gacchatı.

These sūnas which impede the path to moksa are climinated, says Ašādhara, by almsgiving to ascetics, and in fact when they are mentioned in the texts it is always under the head of dāna. The chumeration is as follows

- pounding (khandani, kuttani) symbolized by the pestle and mortar,
- (ii) grinding (pesani) symbolized by the hand-mill;
   (iii) cooking (culli) symbolized by the fire-place;
- (iv) cleansing (uda-kumbha) symbolized by the water-pot,
- (v) sweeping (pramärjani) symbolized by the water-pot
   (v) sweeping (pramärjani) symbolized by the broom.

The five sūnas so styled seem to be peculiar to the Digambaras, being mentioned by Samantabhadra, Āśādhara, and Medhāvin but the enumeration can hardly be strange to the Śvetāmbaras, and in fact, the Nava-pada-prakarana in a quotation' mentions five harmful actions from which a layman who keeps the eratar must refrain: Nandana, pisuna, randhana, dalana, payana. The first three correspond exactly to the first three sinas but then dalana appears to duplicate pisuna and payana to repeat randhana; and an embryonic version of the sinas seems here to have been inserted under the bhogopologoa-vatat. In the same connexion Ratnaskchara' in the fifteenth century quotes a verse almost identical with that given in Prabhäcandra's commentary, and the sinas are mentioned by Căritrasundara' amongst the forms of ārambha.

THE ANARTHA-DANDA-VRATA

THE vow to abstain from harmful activities that serve no useful purpose covers a range of rather disparate topics and overlaps to some extent with the ahmsā-vrata and the bhogopabhoga-vrata, and even with the mrsopadeśa atteāra of the satya-vrata and the para-trivāha-harana atteāra of the brahma-vrata. Four types of aratha-danda are listed in the canon and maintained by the Svetāmbaras and to these the Digambaras, perhaps drawing on the definitions of mithvätva, have added a fifth. The five are:

- (i) evil brooding (apadhyāna);
- (ii) purposeless mischief (pramādācarita);
  (iii) facilitation of destruction (himsā-pradāna);
- (iv) harmful counsel (pāpopadeśa);
- (v) faulty reading (duh-śruti).

All the Svetāmbara authorities, except Siddhasena Ganin and Siddhasena Sūrı, give the last of four (without duh-iruti). The Tativāriha-sūtra does not notice any varieties of amartha-danda but the commentator Pūjyapāda* mentions the above five and they are found in the sizeakāzāras from Samantabhadra* onwards.

(i) APADHYÄNA. The older term for this apadhyānācarita 'action motivated by evil brooding' is not found outside the canonical texts. Abhayadeva6 seems to understand in this connexion

```
1 NPP 75 (p. 32b).
```

<sup>2</sup> Ratnasekhara on Śrāddha-pratikramana-sūtra, 22.

&lt;sup>3</sup> AU m. 23. <sup>4</sup> T (P) vn. 21. <sup>5</sup> RK mi. 29

<sup>6</sup> P (A) 23 (p. 36)

'business worries'. ('When should the merchant caravan set out? What goods should it carry? Where should it go? When would be the right time to buy and to sell? &c.') But already in the Navapada-prakarana Devagupta! has introduced the idea of artadhyāna and raudra-dhyāna whether expressed in an unwholesome desire ('Would that I might win a kingdom or great wealth, or be exempt from old age and death! Would that my enemy might die!") or the satisfaction felt when that desire is fulfilled ('How glad I am that my enemy is dead!'). This interpretation of apadhvāna as ārta-dhvāna and raudra-dhvāna is established by Hemacandra2 and maintained by his successors. The generalized Digambara view is virtually the same it is defined by Pujyapada and Camundaraya3 as 'caressing the ideas of vanquishing, killing, imprisoning, mutilating, and despoiling others'. However, an early text, the Dvadaśānupreksā,4 considers it to refer to 'talking of the faults of others, coveting the riches of others, lusting after the wives of others, and watching the disputes of others'. For Amrtacandras it implies thinking about battles, conquests, hunting, adultery, and theft. Aśādhara,6 however, adopts Hemacandra's explanation.

(11) PRAMĀDĀCARITA. Devagupta7 understands by this the failure to cover with a cloth liquids such as oil, ghee, or molasses, for example, or addiction to vices such as alcoholism and gambling. Yasodeva8 and Abhavadeva refer expressly to 'hurt caused through sloth' To the five pramadas normally listed Hemacandra adds a further wide range of purposeless activities to be avoided: watching dancing displays or theatrical representations or listening to concerts out of curiosity (i.e. when these do not treat of a religious theme), study of the hama-sastras, dicing; games played in pools and watercourses (1ala-hrida), gathering flowers; watching cockfights or other combats of animals, playing with swings, and the maintaining of inherited enmittees 'To sleep the whole night is only permissible when one is exhausted by illness or by a journey. These indications of Hemacandra have been largely developed and expanded by Asadhara,10 but not under the head of anartha-danda. Pramādācarīta he defines as the profitless destruction of prthvikāyas, vāyu-kāyas, tejah-kāyas, and ap-kāyas by such actions as

```
    1 NPP 84
    2 YS III 75
    3 CS, p 9.

    4 KA 344.
    5 PASU 141
    5 SDhA v 9.

    7 NPP 84.
    8 P (Y) 23 (p 89)
    9 YS III. 78-80.
```

digging the ground, obstructing the wind, quenching fire with water, irrigating a field, or felling a tree; and under this head he would condern too all unnecessary travelling. This is in fact the Digambara tradition inherited from Pūyapāda and Cāmunḍarāya, whilst Kārtikeya and Amytacandra use very similar terms. It is to be noted that Hemacandra's groups under the head of pramādā-carita those negligent and irreverent actions within a Jaina temple which are later called ādādanās.

- (iii) HIMSA-PRADANA, Haribhadra and succeeding writers2 explains that it is improper to furnish means of destructionweapons, fire, or poison to another person whether or not he is under the influence of anger at the time. Hemacandra3 elaborates this statement by saving that carts, ploughs, swords, bows, pestles, morters, bellows, or similar objects should not be supplied to another person unless a question of being helpful (daksinvavisave) is involved, since himsa-pradana to a son or other relative is almost unavoidable. Hemacandra's definition has been taken over by Āśādhara, the more general Digambara version is that of Pūivapāda and Camundaraya 4 'the supplying of poison, weapons, fire, rope, whips, staves, and similar objects', whilst Samantabhadras speaks also of chains, swords, axes, and spades. In all these interpretations there are of course no differences except of detail. Karttikeya,6 however, includes under this head the keeping of destructive animals such as cats and all trade in such materials as iron or lac.
- (v) PAPOPADESA. Haribhadra, "who etymologues pāpa as that which precapitates (pāṇayatī) into hell, regards this as 'instruction an evil trade', citing such expressions as 'plough the fields' or 'break in the oxen' as unbefitting a Jana layman. In general pāpoṇadacis' is held to refer to the inevitable but still reprehenable operations of agriculture, but Devaguptaº includes under it the notion of any advice to marry or procreate. Hemacandra's gives a number of additional examples: 'The rains have come, seed time is at hand, so plough the fields', 'geld the stallions', 'set fire to the forest in the hot season'. Like himsa-pradāna, pāpopadeia cannot be avoided when a question of being helpful is involved, but it should never be given out of mere garrulity. Samantabhadra,¹ followed by Cāmuṇḍarāya² (and by Medhāvin), recognizes four types of it:

* CS, p 10. * RK iii. 31. * KA 347. * Åv(H), pt. u, p. 830b påtayati narakädde iti påpom This is more comprehensible if put back into the Prakrit from which it must have been taken. påen naraväte tit påvam.

<sup>8</sup> Åv(H), p. 830b. 9 NPP 84. m YS iii 76.

- (a) talk of buying slaves cheap to sell them dear elsewhere (kleia-vāniiva):
- (b) talk of buying beasts cheap to sell them dear elsewhere (tiryag-vāmiya),
- (c) giving word to trappers, hunters, or fowlers of the presence of beasts and birds (vadhakopadeśa);
- (d) giving advice to cultivators which involves destruction of prthvikäyas, tejah-käyas, väyu-käyas, and ap-käyas (ärambhakopadeia).

Pūjyapāda<sup>3</sup> defines it as advice which stimulates others to pursue harmful activities unnecessarily. Āšādhara<sup>4</sup> has widened the field of application of the term considerably to include any advice leading to himia, falsehood, or theft, or concerning methods of livelihood involving wrongdoing. Amptacandra<sup>4</sup> insists that palpopadaéa should never be given to men to lead them astray in their professions.

(v) DuṇṣRufi. The standard definition of this purely Digambara category, that of Piŋṣapāda, or Cāmunḍarāya, or Amricandra's 's hātening to, reciting, or expounding evil stories through which passion and injury are provoked'. Kārtitkeya' understands by this 'reading kāmā-isārs and listening to the faults of others' For Samantabhadra's 11s the study of works which befoul the mind with harmful activities, worldy attachments, violence, false beliet, hatred, passion, pride, and lust. The seventeenth-century commentator Prabhācandra' offers as examples of texts on false belief those dealing with doctrines such as the Advaita Āsādhara'a dopts Samantabhadra's view and stigmatizes as examples of mind-defiling works the Vātrāyama-kāma-situr on kāma, the Lajaka on hāmā, the Vārtā-nītt on pargraha, the Vīra-kathā on sāhasa, the Brahmādavata on mithyāva, the Vāsā-karapa-tantar on rāga, and on mada such texts as exalt the brahmān's place in the caste system.

The aticaras of this vrata, according to the Svetambara version, are listed below with an indication of the category of anartha-danda of which they are held to be infractions:

(1) libidinous speech (kandarpa) pramādācarita (ii) buffoonery (kautkucya) pramādācarita

(111) garrulity (maukharya) pāpopadeša

(iv) bringing together harmful implements (samvuktādhikarana) himsā-pradāna

(v) superfluity of luxuries (upabhoga-pari-bhogātīreka) nramādācarita The Digambara lists differ on one important point: the fourth atıcara is given as asamikvyādhikarana, generally interpreted as 'inconsiderate action'. Haribhadra, in the Dharma-bindu!, has preferred this more readily intelligible form, which is none the less an innovation of the Tattvārtha-sūtra. Whether this stems from a conscious rationalization or is the fruit of a textual corruption can only be a matter for speculation. Somadeva2 has a quite personal version of the aticaras of this vrata; upadesad vañcana-pravartana (practice of deceit on instructions), arambha-pravartana (practice of harmful activity on instructions), himsā-pravartana (practice of violence on instructions), bhārādikva (overloading of animals), adhika-klesa (inflicting much suffering on them).

(1) KANDARPA. The Tattvärtha-bhäsva<sup>3</sup> defines this as 'indecent language and jesting associated with concupiscence'. Siddhasena Ganin<sup>3</sup> develops this: 'language which is provoked by lust or in which the main element is lust, it is accompanied by movements of the mouth, lips, eyes, and eyebrows to arouse laughter,' Haribhadras accepts the first element of this definition and adds that tradition prescribes that it is unbecoming for a Jama layman to guffaw loudly, if laugh he must, he should confine himself to a slight titter. Abhayadeva, Yasodeva, Municandra, and Siddhasena Suri take the same view and Hemacandras adds a further comment that a fravaka should say nothing to provoke infatuation (mohodreka) in himself or others. For Devendra6 kandarba is no more than roisterous laughter. In the Digambara definition? kandarpa is coarse (asista) language associated with laughter resulting from excessive raga provoked by the rise of caritra-moha.

<sup>1</sup> DhB 111, 33 <sup>2</sup> Handigui, p. 269. 3 T (S) val. 27 (p. 112). 4 Av (H), p. 830b.

<sup>7</sup> CS, p. 10.

<sup>5</sup> YS in. 115.

<sup>6</sup> SrDK, p. 112

(ii) KAUTKUCYA. The Prakrit kukkua is also sanskritized as kaukucya. The commentators prefer to etymologize it as kut (in the sense of a pejorative particle)—kutsitam—kucati; and explain it as 'spasmodic contractions (uankocana) of the cycbrows, eyes, nose, lips, hands, and feet whilst making various sorts of funny movements.'! Haribhadra again cites the traditional statement that atrâtaka ought not to speak in such a way as to make other people laugh, and he is followed by all the Svetämbara ācāryas. The Digambaras consider this atrâta to be 'vulgar speech accompanied by laughter and by undestrable gesticulation'.

(iii) MAUKHARYA Sıddhasena Gaṇin¹ holds this to be speech that is vulgar, prolix, nonsensical (asamhaddha), and impertinent mukhara being an epithet applicable to anyone who speaks without due consideration). That is the general Svetāmbara view. The Digambaras define it as 'constant purposeless talking through selfconcert'.4

(iv) SAMYUKTĀDHIKARANA The traditional Svetāmbara interpretation is unvarying, the keeping together of any two objects (adhikarana-etymologized as 'that by which one's atman is guided to an evil fate'), generally implements or parts of implements, used for any of the activities (ār ambha) of daily life which inevitably involve destruction of jivas 5 If they are kept apart there may be some reduction quantitatively in arambha as the person wishing to use them may be dissuaded from doing so if they are not immediately available. Typical examples of such linked adhikaranas are pestle and mortar, plough and coulter, cart and yoke, bow and arrows. Siddhasena Ganine gives a rather similar interpretation to the asamiks yādhıkarana of the Tattvārtha-sūtra, mentioning the supplying of grindstones (silā-putraka), mill-stones (godhūmavantraka-silā), or sickles (datra), but noting the Digambara definition 'excessive and improper use of an object without consideration for the aim in view'. For the same term in the Dharma-bindu? Municandra offers a purely Śvetāmbara explanation. Pūjyapāda's8 definition is practically identical with that of Siddhasena but there is no identification of the harmful objects. With Camundaraya the concept is more complicated asamiksyādhikarana may be of three kinds, mental, vocal, or physical. Thinking of unprofitable literary productions would be an example of the first type: the second would cover the recounting of purposeless stories or indeed any form of the spoken word through which pain was caused to others; whilst the third would include the cutting, breaking, bruising, or throwing away purposelessly of any sentient or nonsentient leaves, flowers, or fruit. Aśadhara' sees in this offence 'the taking more of anything than is needed for use'.

```
1 Åv (H), p 8306 2 CS, p. 10. 3 T (S) vii 27 (p. 113). 4 CS, p 10. 5 Åv (H), p 8314 6 T (S) vii 27 (p. 113). 7 DhB iii 33 7 T (P) vii 32 9 CS, p. 10
```

In the pratikramana texts there is a special avowal of offences under this head weapons, fire, pestles, mechanical devices (vantra). grass, wood, mantras, roots (mūla), drugs (bhassaiva) given or caused to be given to any person. Devendra2 explains vantra to mean such things as carts; grass may be used to clean maggots from wounds or for besoms, and wood for staves or for normas, whilst mula means roots such as naga-damani3 used, for example, to assuage fever or to procure abortion.

(v) UPABHOGA-PARIBHOGĀTIRIKTITA, Haribhadra4 records a traditional teaching on moderation in the use of upabhogas: if one man takes an excessive amount of oil and myrobalan for his toilet then other people attracted by this luxury go to the bathing tank and many bathe who would not otherwise have done so; and as a result many ap-kāvas and small aquatic creatures perish unnecessarily. Excessive indulgence in betel and flower garlands brings about similar profitless destruction. Accordingly a man who desires to bathe should either do so at home or, failing that, rub oil and myrobalan on to his head at home and, when they are completely dissolved should go to the tank and wash by taking up water in his hands. Abhayadeya, Yasodeya, Municandra, and Hemacandra repeat the same view. Siddhasena,5 in his commentary on the Tattvartha-sutra, explains that bathing and the use of ornaments as well as the consumption of food and drink and unguents must be on a moderate scale and adapted to one's needs. The Digambaras6 regard this aticara merely as the accumulation of upabhoras and paribhogas beyond the limit of one's needs. Asadhara, who calls this transgression sevarthadhikata, prefers Hemacandra's explanation.

Here again the pratikramana8 texts enjoin the confession of faults committed in connexion with bathing, unguents (udvartana).

<sup>1</sup> SDhA v 12. <sup>2</sup> Devendra on Śrāddha-pratikramana-sūtra, 24. <sup>4</sup> Åv (H), p 831a. <sup>5</sup> T (S) vu. 27. 2. <sup>8</sup> Śrāddha-pratikramaņa-sūtra, 25. 3 Artemna vulgaris Lann. 7 SDhA v 12.

<sup>6</sup> CS, p 11.

cosmetics (varnaka), cooling pastes (vilepana), sounds, shapes, tastes, smells, clothes, couches, and ornaments. The washing of the body after anointing should not be done at a spot where there are trata-jivas, nor at a time when there are many sampātima creatures abroad, nor with unfiltered water. Uniquents should not be dropped in the dust where they may become infested with maggots only to be eaten later by dogs or trodden under foot. Varnakas such as musk and in vilepanas such as sandal-paste or saffion may also give rise to sampātima creatures. Under the head of sabda the following are reprehended the sounds of muscal instruments when listened to out of mere curiosity, and the noise made to arouse house lizards at night so that they come out to eat files. Similarly undesirable are the shapes of women viewed at theatrical performances or described to others, and the savour of tasty dishes despited to others to increase their sourmakise.

One point emerges clearly from all the texts it is because unnecessary evil actions (nurarthaha-pāpa) bind on additional karma that amartha-damda is to be at all costs a voided. But here a careful distinction has to be made between what is aitha and what is amartha. By artha, for example, Haribharda'i understands 'the practical interests of the family'. Devagupita's' definition is more explicit whatever harmful action is done for the sake of religion (such as building a temple), or for the bodily organs (indrya) (such as eating nourshment or taking betel), or in order to produce food (such as farming) is artha, any similar action for other ends such as the cutting down of creepers or the killing of lizards is amartha

Certain writers tend to stigmatize as a grave form of pramādācarīta some of the offences commonly called the oyasanas, particularly gambling and the frequentation of prostitutes. This point is made particularly by Devagupta For Amrtacandra, 1 too, gambling takes precedence over all other forms of anartha and leads to lying and stealing.

Somadeva's attempts a general definition of the various elements comprised under the term anatha-danda. It would include all acts done to spite, sadden, or denigrate others, or through which others are huit or deprived of liberty. More specifically it refers to the keeping of harmful animals and the provision of harmful objects.

```
<sup>1</sup> SrPr 290 <sup>2</sup> NPP 8<sub>3</sub> <sup>3</sup> NPP 8<sub>4</sub>

<sup>4</sup> PASU 146 <sup>5</sup> Handiqu, p 269.
```

A narrower view is that of Vasunandin.<sup>1</sup> the observance of the anartha-danda-vrata implies a ban on the selling of iron rods or snares, the keeping of destructive animals, and measuring with false balances.

As has already been noted the main differences in the scope of this vow, as understood by Svetämbaras and Digambaras, are to be found in the addition by the Digambaras of duh-sruit to the four categories listed in the Upäanka-daish and in the replacement of amyuktädhikarana by asamikiyädhikarana. The ban on the keeping of such creatures as destroy other lives—cats, dogs, mongooses, cocks, owo only by the parrots, peacocks, and mynahs—seems to be introduced by the Digambaras, almost all of whom insist on this.

Amtagati' appears to have included under the anartha-danjarata certain elements which elsewhere are covered by the bhogopabhoga-orata. Thus he stipulates that iron, lac, indigo, saffron, bees-wax (madana), hemp, weapons, pickles (sandhānaha), sūranakanda, flowers, curds that have been left for two days, rice that has sprouted or fermented, water-melons, and drona flowers are to be eschewed.

THE SÄMÄYIKA-VRATA

For all the ācāṛyat the sāmāyīka is at the same time the first tikātevata (except for Āṣādhara and Samantabhadra, who make it the second, and for Vasunandin, who omits it altogether) and the third pratimā. At the same time it is one of the six āvasiyakar and, to mention a category which is outside the sphere of this survey, one of the five cāritras. As an āvasiyaka it belongs to the life of the layman when it is temporary (itvarika) and to that of the monk when it is lifelong (yāvai-Asāthita).

Two explanations of the term are usually current. For Siddhasena Ganin<sup>3</sup> it is an exercise in samāya etymologized as tatainment (aya) of equaniting or tranquillity of mind (sama). Pūjyapāda<sup>4</sup> holds samaya to be 'the process of becoming one (chatea-gamana), of fusion of the activities of body, mind, and speech with the ātman<sup>3</sup>, and the practice designed to achieve this

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sr (V) 215.
<sup>2</sup> Sr (A) vi. 81-85.
<sup>3</sup> T (S) vii. 16 (p. 91).
<sup>4</sup> T (P) vii. 21.

end is the sāmāyika. In any event the sāmāyika in Haribhadra's¹ definition implies at the same time the cessation of all blameable activity and the concentration on blameless activity.

The Śvetāmbara texts give a ritual for the sāmajikā based on the Anažijaka Cūrni, a distinction being made between the ordinary and the affluent layman. For a man of great wealth or invested with the authority of a ruler special rules are laid down in order to increase the presuge of the Janna community by emphasizing the fact that he has adhered to the sucred doctrine. In the former case the following nonedure is prescribed<sup>2</sup>:

The sandynha may be performed in one's own house or in a temple, or in a specially designed fasting-hall (posadha-sālā), or in the presence of a sādhu, or in a place where one is resting or not engaged in any activity. The individual intending to perform the rite must not be in fear of anyone or in dispute with anyone or indebted to anyone, nor should there be other cause for anxety to sway his mind in any direction. He must, the a sādhu, observe the five samute and the three guptir and aword all harmful (sāradya) speech, and before picking up or setting down any object he must not neglect pratitekhana and pramārjana. He should try to avoid spitting or blowing his nose, but if he cannot help doing so, should first find a bare patch of ground and carry out pratitekhana and pramārjana. Then, making obeisance to the sādhus, he is to repeat the following formula:

karemı bhante sümüyam süvəyyam yogam paccakkhämi yövə sahu payuväsümi duviham turihenam manenam viyös köyenam na karemi karövemi tassa bhante padikkamümi undüm garihämi appänam vosirämi.

I engage, lord, in the câmāyikā, making pratyūlshyāma, for as long as I worship the sādhus of harmful activities whether I have done them or caused them to be done by others, neither with mind, speech nor body will I do them or cause them to be done by others; I confess them, lord, and reprehend and repent of them, and I cast sade my past self.

Each word of this formula—usually styled the sāmāyika-sūtra is analysed in detail by the commentators. Thus the Prakrit vocative bhante is interpreted as an invocation of him 'who makes an end to existence, to reincarnation' (bhavānta) Nindāmi and garihāmi are

&lt;sup>1</sup> Åv (H), p. 831b
<sup>2</sup> Äv (H), p. 832a
<sup>3</sup> pratilekhana is the scanning of the ground or of any object for the presence of living creatures and pramaryana the removing of such living creatures by means of a monk's broom (rajo-harana).

It will be recalled that garhā in one of the gunas of samyaktva.

said to have the same meaning, but the former expresses reprobation made in one's own mind and the latter reprobation voiced in the presence of a guru. Praiphhylmon of course refers to harmful activities in the future, pratikramana to those already past; and it is the self which is the author of past harmful activity (awadyayoga) which is cast aside.)

After rectung this formula the layman must make airyāpathhār prathramaṇa and then ālonanā After vandana to the ācāryas in order of semority and to his preceptor he is to make pratilekhana and sit down to engage in roādhyāya. If (as happens when any of the impediments mentioned at the beginning exist) the šāmāyika is performed in one's own home or in the popadha-śalā the question of the arrival formalities does not arise.

A king or very rich man will come with camaras and chattras and regal ornaments, there will be horses and elephants and footsoldiers and chariots in his retinue, and as he goes to the presence of the sadhu or to the temple, the common people will bow down and praise him crying, 'Blessed is the sacred law.' When he arrives he will lay aside the insignia of royalty and take off shoes, and sword, and diadem; and then only is he to make fina-pujā and guru-vandana. If, when he has performed the sāmāyika, he were to go away as he came with much pomp and a great retinue it would be from the religious angle undestrable, so he departs on foot. As the sādhus cannot fittingly stand up when he arrives, since he is only a śrāvaka, a seat is disposed beforehand so that he may be given the honours fitting to his rank while the acaryas await him standing up. Thus the delicate question of whether or not they should rise does not present itself, and on arrival he makes the sāmāyika and then pratikramana and then pays reverence to the sādhus. During this time he lays aside his ear-rings, signet-ring, flower garlands, betcl, and outer garment, but opinions differ as to whether he should or should not take off his diadem.2

It is reiterated in many places that in the sāmāyika the layman becomes like an ascetic and for that reason it should be performed often. The assertion seems to stem originally from the Āvaiyakanir yukti:3

> sāmāryammi u kae samaņo wa sāvao havai jamhā eena hāranenam bahuso sāmāryam kuŋā

&lt;sup>1</sup> YŚ 111. 82 (p 505). <sup>2</sup> Āv (H), p 832*a-b*; YŚ 111 82 (pp. 508-9). <sup>3</sup> Āv (H), p. 832*a*.

A similar verse is to be found in the Sravaka-brainabti.1 whilst in the Pratima-pañcasaka2 the samavika is described as the layman's highest temporary guna-sthana; it may exert such an effect on him that he is led to renounce the world altogether. However, this assimilation of the śravaka to the vati is to a greater or less extent a feature of all the necessary rites, and even in the samavika where the identity of layman and ascetic is most nearly achieved too much stress can be laid on the comparison. Haribhadra3 warns that the likeness will never be more than partial just as when reference is made to a candra-mukhi stri: her face resembles the moon only in its roundness (pārimāndalya), affability (saumyatā), and grace (kanti) but differs from it in many other ways. Since the householder when he 'empties his senses' with mind concentrated on the Jina attains in effect to the maha-vratas at a particular point in time and space it might be supposed that he would achieve perfect restraint and self-control (samvama). However, as Pūjvapadas points out, the karmans and kasāyas are still present so that the term mahā-vrata can only be held to be used figuratively, just as castra is said to be present everywhere in a royal household.

Samantabhadra's envisages the layman who is performing the sămāyika as a monk on whom clothes have been draped, and this phrase becomes a cliché with succeeding Digambaras. Cămundarāya's takes the view that by overcoming the parişahas and upasargas, by maintaining selience, and by refranting from all mantiestation of himañ he does in fact achieve the mahā-tratas. Elsewhere, however, it is emphasized that there is no real cessation of attachment to material things or disapproval for those activities of daily life which constitute ārambha. Where the sādhu has recourse to the mahā-tratas the strāuaka relies on the apu-tratas; nor does the latter necessarily maintain the full ritual prescriptions, for example, those governing the use of the mukha-vastrikā and rajo-haraṇa, even during the sāmāyikā.

The older Svetāmbara texts generally lay down that the sāmāyaka should be carried out as often as possible. 8 Amongst the Digambaras Amytacandra's recommends morning and evening and whenever possible outside those times, and Ašādhara's the nighttime and the end of day; but usually the three sandhyās or links of time—dawn, noon, and sunset—are indicated as proper for the practice of the rite, which should last for a minimum of one muhūrta.

As has already been noted, the choice of a place for its performance is, for the Svetämbarsa, the same as that offered for the other ävadyakar, and the Pratimā-pāičaālaka' even refers expressly to a communal sāmāyika observance in the poṣadha-sālā. The Dīgambarsa lay more stress on silence and solitude. Kārtinkeya' insists on a place where there are no gnats or other disturbing insects, no ababble of sounds (kadayada), and no tumult of many people; Samantabhadra' suggests a solitary forest clearing, a sanctuary, or one's own home; Vasunadnin'a temple, one's own home, or any undefiled spot facing north or facing south; and Āsādhara' is content merely with solitude.

Svetāmbaras and Digambaras give the aticaras of this grata alike:

- (1) misdirection of mind (mano-duspranidhāna);
- (ii) misdirection of speech (vāg-dusprandhāna);
   (iii) misdirection of body (kāya-dusprandhāna),
- (iv) forgetfulness of the sāmāvika (smrtv-akarana):
- (v) instability in the samāyika (anavasthita-karana).
- (i) Mano-duspranıdhāna. For Haribhadra'e this means 'wondering whether household tasks have been rightly performed'. He quotes from the Śrāvaha-prajiāphi'a verse to the effect that the sāmāyha, when performed by a sāvaha who under the influence of ārta-dhyāna becomes a prey to mundane anxieties, is ineffective. Siddhasena Ganina explains that dusprandhāna arises when the mind is swayed by eddies of anger, avance, deceit, pride, and envy: and this interpretation is followed by later Svetāmbaras. Pijyapāda and Cāmunḍarāya'e hold that this attaāra implies a failure to surrender the mind to meditation.
- (ii) Vāg-duṣprandhāna. Haribhadra¹o defines this as the use of indecent, harsh, or hurtful language. The Srawaka-prajūspti,¹ again repeatedly quoted on this point, lays down that is essential to speak with discretion and avoid any words that can have a harmful effect; otherwise the iāmāyhka becomes impossible. For Siddhasena Gannira¹ths iatārām amounts to confused and hesitant

```
<sup>1</sup> P (SrUP) 12.
<sup>2</sup> KA 353.
<sup>3</sup> RK iv. 9.
<sup>4</sup> Sr (V) 274.
<sup>5</sup> SDhA v. 28.
<sup>6</sup> Åv (H), p. 834a.
<sup>8</sup> T (S) vii. 28.
<sup>9</sup> CS, p. 11.
<sup>10</sup> Åv (H), p. 834b.
<sup>11</sup> SrPr 314.
<sup>12</sup> T (S) vii. 28
```

enunciation of the syllables and inability to comprehend the meaning of the text. The same view is taken by Hemacandra and by Pūjyapāda, Cāmundarāya, and Āśādhara.

(in) Kāya-duspranidhāna. Haribhadra¹ understands by this the failure to make pratilehhana and pramārjana of the ground and of all material objects, and to keep the hands and feet and other limbs of the body from moving, amounting to pramāda in the performance of the sāmāyika. In this connexion he speaks of making pramārjana with the soft flap of a garment. On the nature of this atteāra there is general agreement among Svetāmbaras and Durambaras.

(iv) Smrty-akarana. This is generally held to be an inability through extreme carelessness to remember when the cămāyuka is to be performed or whether or not it has been performed. Thus since the whole of the religious life depends on mindfulness the sāmāyika is nullified. Unlike mano-duspramdlāna which implies a temporary deviation of the mental processes this aticāra can vitiate the practice of the sāmāyika over long periods. Lack of concentration is the simple Digambara definition.<sup>4</sup>

(v) Anavasthita-karana. This is explained as a failure to observe the proper formalities in carrying out the sāmāyika, or a readiness to give it up after a very short time, or the taking of food immediately after it is finished. The Digambaras apply the designation amādara to this aticāra, explaining it as a lack of zeal in the performance of the sāmāyika a

The nature of the sāmāynka, as it is presented in the early svetāmbara texts, is obscured or altered at an early date among the Digambaras, at least as an element of the lay life. The concept of a brief period of detachment from the world and its cares, of a respite from the tyramy of love and hate, is still to the fore in Plyjapäda, Samantabhadra, Cāmundarāya, and above all Amṛtacandra' but with this are gradually being associated, as aids to the attainment of this state of mind, elements of ritual from the other Zouāyakas. Thus Samantabhadra' prescribes for the sāmāynka the ritual movements and other requirements (Zourla, praṇāma, yatha-jāta, gutha-jāta, niṣadya, tri-yoga-śuddhı) that form part of the vandanaka in the Svetāmbara canonical writings, whilst āvartas and pranāmas are mentioned by Kārttikeya.<sup>1</sup>

&lt;sup>7</sup> Åv (H), p. 8<sub>34</sub>b. <sup>2</sup> T (S) v<sub>H</sub> 28 <sup>3</sup> YŚ m. 116 (p. 577). <sup>4</sup> T (P) v<sub>H</sub> 33 <sup>5</sup> YŚ m. 116 (p. 577). <sup>6</sup> CS, p. 11.

PASU 148, RK IV. 10. The general picture is that of the sainle indifference of St François de Sales.
RK V. 18

Posture and symbol assume an increasing importance. The sanketa types of pratyākhyāna offer a model for Samantabhadra2 when he proposes that the samavika should be maintained for as long as the hair is tied up, or the fist clenched, or the garment knotted. These symbolic limits for its duration-keśa-bandha, musti-bandha, and vastra-bandha-are noted again by Camundarāva' and by Āśādhara. Various mudrās find a place in Amitagati'ss description of the rite. they include the three-fina-mudra, yogamudrā, and muktā-śukti-mudrā—that have been incorporated in the standard Svetāmbara castya-vandana ritual, as well as a vandanamudra in which the devotee stands with his hands clasped in the form of a half-open lotus on his stomach. Five forms of obeisance (pranāma) are noted by Amitagati:6 with one limb (the head), with two limbs (the hands), with three limbs (the head and hands), with four limbs (the hands and knees), and with five limbs (the head, hands, and knees). These types are fairly generally accepted and are noted by Hemacandra.7 The third pranama is the ardhavanata and the fifth the pañcānea of the cartya-vandana ritual. There are more considerable divergencies in the recommendations for the postures to be adopted in the sāmāvika: Kārttikeva8 mentions the paryankāsana and the seated kāyotsarga to which Samantabhadra® and Aśādhara<sup>10</sup> add the upright kāyotsarga; Amitagati<sup>11</sup> envisages the padmāsana, paryankāsana, virāsana, and gav-āsana, Cāmundarāya12 speaks of the paryankāsana and makara-mukhāsana; and Somadeva<sup>13</sup> notes the padmāsana, vīrāsana, and sukhāsana. Kārttikeya14 lists seven requisites for the samayika: fitting time (kala) and place (ksetra), posture (asana) and mood (vilaya), purity of mind (manah-suddhi), of speech (vacana-suddhi), and of body (kāyaśuddhi).

But the most significant extraneous element which is absorbed into the sāmāyika is the custom of making offerings. Samantabhadra<sup>15</sup> envisaged the pūjā as an aspect of dāna, but the more general trend is to associate it with the sāmāyika, and from this stems the

```
    1 KA 371
    2 RK v. 8
    3 CS, p. 11

    4 SDhA v. 28.
    2 Sr (A) vus. 51-56.
    6 Ind 63-64

    7 YS, p. 612.
    8 KA 355.
    9 RK v. 8.

    10 SDhA v. 28.
    11 Sr (A) vus. 45-48.
    12 CS, p. 11.

    11 Handious, p. 281.
    14 KA 152.
    11 RK v. 30.
```

C 787

injunction that it is to be performed at the three sandhyās. Even Amṛtacandra¹ regards pijā with prānuka substances as part of the sāmāyjkā ritual whilst Vasunandin² comprises under this the adoration of the sacred doctrine, the images, and the parameṭhims. The logical development is already clearly apparent in the Vaisatilaka² where the discussion of the sāmāyika-avata covers dhyāna as well as every form of árayva-pijā and bhāva-pijā.

With the Svetāmbaras a more rugid tradition maintains the separate identity of the sämäyhae-ratals but at the same time, as will be seen, many elements from it are incorporated into the cariya-vandama. Thus the five abhigamas of that ritual are drawn from the description of the arrival of the ruler or rich disciple desirous of performing the sāmāyhāa. In fact, as with the Digambaras, this slanting of the concept had begun at an early date. Abhayadeva, in his commentary on the Pañačiahaa, expressly admits the possibility of performing, for example, Jima-napanapājā during the sāmāyhāa inasmuch as pājā does not fall within the definition of sāradiva-vova.

However, sāmāyhān and cantya-vandama are stull felt to be sufficiently distinct to receive separate treatment in the Srāddha-dimakrtya. In the section devoted to the sāmāyhka Devendra notes the traditional distinction of the rich and poor disciples and the description of the ritual given in the Aeaiyaka Cūrni, adding one significant detail that is of later origin. If the vocative bhante is used in the recitation of the sāmāyhka-sītra it is obligatory on the devotee, if no monk is present, to set up a rithāpanācārya—a symbolic representation of the guru—to which adoration is offered just as the Jina image is worshipped in place of the Jina, who is for ever absent from the world. For this sīthāpanācārya Devendra uses the term sūris. 3 The sāmāyhka is also mentioned in another passage of the Srāddha-dina-krīya where it appears to designate any worship offered in the home when, because of some impediment, a man is unable to go to the temple.

The diminishing importance of the sāmāyika in the lay life is manifest in the fifteenth-century Śrāddha-vidhī' where it figures among the practices which are possible only during the lessure of the ramy season. In that connexion Ratnaśckhara comments signi-

&lt;sup>1</sup> PASU 155.
<sup>2</sup> Śr (V) 275.
<sup>3</sup> Handiqui, pp. 269-82.
<sup>4</sup> P (A) 25 (p. 38).
<sup>5</sup> ŚrDK 230.
<sup>6</sup> Ibid. 77

&lt;sup>7</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 158a

ficantly that the acceptance of the  $s\bar{a}m\bar{a}yika$  is difficult for a rich man whilst the  $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$  is easy.

A brief allusion deserves to be made to the resemblance between the deāwakāitha-vrata and sāmāytka-vrata noted by some Digambara ācāryas. Samantabhadra' defines the latter as the complete avordance of those five sins which are the subject of the anu-vratas. Ašādhara insstst' that a distinction must be made between them, explaining that in the deiāwakāitha-vrata all pāpa outside a tiny radius ceases whilst in the sāmāyhka-vrata for a brief moment all pāpa everywhere is eliminated.

THE DEŚĀVAKĀŚIKA-VRATA

In character closely related to the dig-evata, of which it is a reduced version in time and space, this vow is considered by the Svetämbaras to be the second of the siskā-vataa; but the Digambaras in the main prefer to place it among the guna-vratas immediately after the dig-evata. However, Samantabhafar (with Sakalakirti) and Āšādhara (with Medhāvin) hold it to be the first, and Kārttikeya the last, of the siskā-vratas. Perhaps because considered to be basically identical with the dig-evata the designa-kāiska-vrata is omitted by those ācāryas who make sallekhanā the subject of the last siskā-vratas.

Åbhayadeva¹ describes this trata as an assumption for a limited time (arakāta) of the restrictions of place (deta) set forth in the digtrata since freedom of movement is restricted to a tiny part of the area previously measured out. Where previously the boundaries were measured in hundreds of yojanar and the restrictions were to operate for a hifetime or a year or, at the very least, for four months, it is the surroundings of one's home and the limits of a day that are now prescribed. It is in fact a symbolic epitome of all the tratar. Its intensity, says the Śrācaka-projipati,' should be contained within a small compass like the poison of the serpent's eye. Haribhadra explains this illustration thus, at one time the serpent's poison eye could kill at a radius of twelve yojanas but later a magician drove it away and limited its range to one yojana. In the same way a layman is to contract his harmful activities and reduce the danger caused by them by imposing narrower limits on his own 'poison eye' those movements which kill living beings.

For the spatial dimensions of the dekārahāhha-roztat Siddhasena Ganin' prescribes a room of a house, a whole house, a wilage, or a township, and, as an example of its duration, the period from dusk to dawn. Other time limits suggested are a night, a day, five days, a fortunght, or for even shorter periods such as praharor are muhārta.<sup>2</sup>

Spatial limitations with the Digambaras are similar. Samanta-bhadra' suggests as suitable boundaries a house, a merchant caravan, a village, a wood, or, in terms of measurements, one yojana. Cāmundarāya' proposes the suppression of all journeying except for the walk from one's home to the bathing tank and back. Amptacandra's would confine movement to a village, a street, a market, or a house. There is a tendency among later Digambaras to read into this virata a ban on certain types of travel irrespective of limits set. Thus Medhāvina' condemns under this head all journeying to countries where the Jaina teaching is unknown and its prescriptions not observed. In regard to time the Digambaras would seem to admit much longer periods for the observance of the deśārakāsika-virata than do the Svetāmbaras. Samantabhadra' speaks of a fortnight, a month, i two months, four months, six months, a year, and Kārttikeya's mentions a year' or other period'.

The basic idea underlying both the dig-orata and the delävablatha-vrata is that if a man reduces his freedom of movement to a restricted area, small or large, his absence from all the area not comprised within the self-imposed limits will mean that he can be said to be keeping the mahā-vratas, the rigid vows of an ascetic, in that wider area, whilst at the same time constant awareness of these spatial limits will result in added vigilance in the observation of the anti-vratas within them.

All the siāvakācāra texts record the aticāras of this vow in the same form

- (i) having something brought from outside (anayana-prayoga)
- (ii) sending a servant for something from outside (presyaprayoga);
- (111) communicating by making sounds (sabdānupata);

```
<sup>1</sup> T (S) vii. 16 (p. 90).
<sup>2</sup> YŠ iii. 117.
<sup>3</sup> RK iv 3
<sup>4</sup> CS, p 9.
<sup>5</sup> PASU 139
<sup>6</sup> Šr (M) vii 40.
<sup>8</sup> KA 367
```

- (iv) communicating by making signs (rūpānupata),
- (v) communicating by throwing objects (bahya-pudgalapraksepa).
- (i) ÄNAYANA-PRAYOGA. This would seem from the evidence of the texts to mean 'getting somehody to take a message in order to obtain something from outside one's self-imposed limits'.\(^1\) Hemacendra' explains that the essence of the ordar—the avoidance of harm to living organisms through moving to and fro outside the designated area—is violated even by causing someone else to make such movements on one's behalf. The Digambaras style this attacha simply \(\frac{a}{a}\) anyana and render as 'giving orders to have something brought from outside the limits'.\(^2\)
- (ii) PRESYA-PRAYOGA The older Svetämbara texts distinguish this offence from the preceding one by implying an element of compulsion 'giving orders to a servant to have something brought from outside'. The Digambaras interpret it as 'causing work to be done by a servant outside one's self-imposed limits 'a in both this and in the previous attacknown orders are given to an employer.
- (iii) SABDANUPATA. The picture of this attakar given by the Svetämbaras is more or less as follows: a man stands just inside the wall or enclosure of his house (which he has chosen as the boundary of his activity) and by making noises such as sneezing or coughing attracts the attention of people who are near at hand, and then employs them on various errands. The Digambaras consider that the offence consists in attracting the attention of men working outside in the hope that they will understand and do what is required of them without delay. §
- (iv) RUPANUPATA. This is exactly parallel to the preceding aticara except that signs and gestures are used to attract attention.
- (v) PUDGALA-PRAKSEPA. Again there is an exact parallelism (both for Digambaras and Svetāmbaras). Here clods of earth, sticks, stones, or bricks are thrown to attract attention.

THE POSADHOPAVĀSA-VRATA

For the Prakrit posaha (corresponding to uparasatha) there have come into existence a number of false sanskritizations paupadha, proyadha, posadha—of which the last seems to have attained the most general currency. It is commonly held to mean the param, the day of the moon's periodic change and the etymologically tautological posadhopavāsa is accordingly interpreted as 'the fast on the param day'. Whilst this is the only explanation admitted by some texts, by the 'Tattaitha-bhāya,' for example, elsewhere the fantasy is given free play and the posadha becomes 'that which strengthens or fattens the religious life'. (posam pustum prakramād dhamasya dhatte posadha) <sup>2</sup> For Caritrasundara it is a contraction of paramausadha 'the supreme medicament'. In ordinary usage of course posadha is synonymous with posadhopavāsa.

There are some major divergencies between Digambaras and Svetämbaras in posadha observance The Digambara texts explicitly or implicitly indicate that the fast should continue from noon on the day preceding the posadha (the dharanaka) till noon on the following day (the pāranaka) that is, for a total of fortyeight hours. The Svetambara writers, however, mention a period of twenty-four hours (aho-ratea) and some of the later authorities admit even a shorter term.4 There are four bosadha days-the catusparvi made up of astami, caturdasi, purnima, and amavasi-in a month but some Svetämbaras admit the possibility of additional days Thus the most widespread view is that of the Tattvārthabhāsya,5 which names specifically the astami, caturdasi, and pañcadasi of each half-month with the possibility of other optional posadha days (for which Siddhasena Ganin suggests the bratibada), and the late Acaropadesa6 would regard the 2nd, 5th, 8th, 11th, and 14th of each parvan as posadha days. In the main, however, the texts are silent on this point.

In the classifications of the doctrine the posadha has two niches: it is the third (or for some Digambaras the second) sikṣa-vrata and,

&lt;sup>1</sup> T (S) vii 16 (p 92) <sup>2</sup> YŚ iii 85

<sup>3</sup> However, it would seem that this might in practice be longer as the layman should not break his fast till he has ted the ascetics, that is, not until after the first paring of the day.

e g. Ratnašekhara in the Sraddha-vidhi, p. 153b

<sup>5</sup> T (S) vii 16 (p 92)

<sup>6</sup> ÅU v. 4-12

at the same time, it is the fourth pratima. It is also sometimes regarded as a form of tapas. It will be convenient to treat together any references to the posadha, irrespective of the category to which they are assigned, and to commence by a description of the ritual as the later Svetämbaras have codified it.

From the canonical texts onwards the Svetāmbaras list four spheres of application for the posadha, which may in each case be either partial (deśatas) or entire (sarvatas):

- (i) In respect of food (āhāra):
  - (a) partial—eating once or twice only during the period, or eating tasteless food (nirvibritya) only, or taking only rice and water (ācāmāmla), or taking only water;
- (b) entire—complete abstinence from the fourfold aliments.
- (ii) In respect of bodily care (deha-satkāra):
  - (a) partial—omitting some aspect of the toilet such as bathing;
    - (b) entire—complete abstinence from bathing, massaging, cooling pastes, perfumes, and all other forms of care for the person.
- (III) In respect of sexual intercourse (maithuna):
  - (a) partial—continence during the day only, or for a period of one or more praharas, or limitation to one or two acts of intercourse during the full period;
    - (b) entire-complete abstinence from sexual relations.
- (iv) In respect of worldly occupations (vvāpāra):
  - (a) partial—refraining from certain of the harmful activities of a householder;
  - (b) entire—complete abandonment of all activities.

It would appear that it is only in regard to food that the Digambara acāryara danit the possibility of partial restraints: they insist on total abstinence in all other respects. Thus Amitagati's tipulates for the performance of the posadha the relinquishment of all boduly adornment (samskāra) including garlands, perfumes, unguents, and even betel (which is generally considered as āhāra), and of worldly duties, as well as a state of brahma-carya. Similarly Kārt-tikeya's' ruling is clear: that without complete cessation of ārambha no posadhopažas as effective.

With regard to food there are then three possibilities:1

- (i) the best (uttama)-upavāsa (a complete fast);
- (ii) the next best (madhyama) anupavāsa (a fast in which the taking of water is permitted);
- (iii) the least satisfactory (jaghanya)-eka-sthana or sakrd-bhojana (the taking of one meal a day).

All these food restrictions are of course forms of pratyākhyāna. There is fairly general agreement on the nature of the uttama and madhyama types but for the jaghanya type Aśadhara2 prefers ācāmāmla (taking only rice and water) or mrt ikrtya (taking only food without vikrtis) whilst Vasunandin3 offers a choice of eka-sthana. or eka-bhakta, or ācāmāmla, or nirvikrtya, and Vāmadeva+ mentions only kannkāhāra (which is equivalent to ācāmāmla) 5

Pūjyapādab and Cāmundarāya regard the posadhopavāsa as a relinguishment of the pleasures of the five senses even of such as are afforded to the ear by sounds. Camundarava? indeed etymologizes the word upavasa as 'the state in which the sense organs abide (vasanti) after reaching (upetva) quiescence. In general it is held that the primary aim of the posadhopavāsa is to enable the sāmāyika to be properly performed, wherever it is entire there of necessity the sāmāyika exists, where it is partial the sāmāyika may or may not be attained. Āśādhara8 takes up from Samantabhadra the cliché that a man performing the posadha appears to onlookers as a muni on whom clothes have been draped.

According to the Svetāmbaras the fast, like the āvašyakas in general, may be carried out in a temple, in a posadha-śālā, in the presence of a sadhu, or in one's own home. The Digambaras are generally content to say that any secluded spot is suitable but Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāyao recommend a temple, or the abode of a sādhu, or one's own fasting-room (sva-poşadhopavāsa-grha). Somadeva10 mentions a temple, one's home, a hill-top, or a forest glade. The whole time should be spent in meditation (dhyāna) or scriptural study (svādhyāya).

The posadha ritual is given in considerable detail in the later

```
1 RK 1V 19
                           2 SDhA v. 35.
                                                       3 Śr (V) 292.
4 BhS (V) 508.
For an explanation of these terms see p 200.
6 T (P) vn 21.
                           7 CS, p 12,
                                                       8 SDhA via. 5.
```

&quot; CS, p 12 10 Handiqui, p 282

Śvetāmbara writings. The following description is taken from Yaśovijaya<sup>1</sup>, who has used a number of older texts:<sup>2</sup>

On the posadha day the layman is to lay aside ornaments of gold and jewels and to remove garlands, vilepanas and varnahas and to break off all his worldly occupations. Then taking all he requires for the posadha he should go to the posadha-śālā or to the presence of a sadhu, choosing a suitable piece of bare ground for defecation and micturition. If no sadhu is present he sets up a sthapanacarva after reciting the namaskara, then makes airya-pathiki-pratikramana and recites a ksamā-śramana 3 After examining his mukha-vastrikā for living organisms he again recites a ksamā-śramana followed by a declaration of his intention to carry out the posadhopavāsa either partially or entirely in the four kinds. After further repetitions of the ksamā-śramana he performs sāmāvika and svādhvāva. Then he again examines his mukha-vastrikā and also his clothes, and rajoharana, and the sthanaracarva. Then he makes pratilekhana of his bedding and brushes the posadha-sālā, and after arvā-pathikipratikramana again, engages in svādhyāya like a sādhu. He may then, if it is the proper occasion, make build in the temple. If his posadhopavāsa is not to be a complete fast (that is, if it is to be ekāsana, or ācāmāmla, or mrvikrtya, or anupavāsa) he may go home to eat or drink or else have food or drink brought to him in the posadha-sālā by his servants but should not obtain his meal by begging as a sādhu would. Returning to the posadha-sālā he follows the same routine as before. If he has to satisfy a bodily need he must observe the same precautions as a sadhu. If required he should perform viśrāmanā for the sādhus. At the end of the appointed time he declares that the posadha is completed, stands up, and recites the namaskara and then, kneeling with his head touching the ground, recites verses in praise of disciples of Mahavira, who performed the bosadha.

Āsādhara* gives the following directions for the performance of the poyadhopawāra. After eating and feeding the sādhus at noon the layman should go to a secluded spot and fast. He should spend the rest of that day meditating on religion and, after performing the evening pējā and other necessary duties, should pass the night on a

<sup>1</sup> Dharma-Sangraha, pp. 90 ff.

<sup>2</sup> As, for example, Haribhadra's commentary on the Avaivaka Sūtra.

<sup>3</sup> For an explanation of this and other terms used see pp. 199 ff.

<sup>4</sup> SDhA v. 36-38.

bed which is devoid of living organisms, devoting himself to raddhyāya, and letting his mind dwell on the anutprekṣās. After the six prahara of the night are over he is to get up and carry out the dawn pigā and necessary duties, to pass the remaining ten prahara; in similar fashion, and at noon on the morrow of the parvam day to take a moderate repast, at the same time feeding the sādhua. During the fast pigā should be made either mentally or with acuta materials such as aksata to Jinas, šātra and gurus, and all such diversions as music and dancing which lead the mind astray should be avoided.

More extensive information is given by Vasunandin. On the saptami and travodasi days of each half-month the layman, after eating and feeding the munis, is to wash his face and hands and feet, and clean out his mouth, and go to the temple for worship, After paying obeisance to the guru and carrying out the necessary duties in his presence he is to fast from the fourfold aliments also in his presence. The rest of that day he will spend reciting the scriptures. listening to dharma-kathās, and thinking on the anupreksās. He performs the evening pujā and passes as much of the night as he can in the kayotsarga posture. Having made pratilekhana of the ground and prepared a bed in a small compass he is to sleep in the temple or in his own house, or else he may pass the whole night in the kayotsarga. Rising at dawn he will carry out the morning worship of Jina, fastra and gurus with dravya-pūjā and bhava-pūjā. According to the same pattern he will pass the actual posadha day and the morning of the bar anaka day which follows, and will then return home to eat and to feed the sadbus

There is little factual difference in the atteāras recognized by Svetāmbaras and Dīgambaras but there are two ways of arrangement of them: one traditionally Svetāmbara, and the other adopted by the Dīgambaras and also by Haribhadra in the Dharma-bhudra and by Hemacandra in the Yoga-8istra.3 The former scheme is:

- (1) failure to examine the sleeping-place (apratilekhsta-śayyā);
- (ii) failure to examine the place of excretion (apratilekhita-sthandila).
- (iii) failure to sweep the sleeping-place (apramārjita-śayyā);
- (iv) failure to sweep the place of excretion (apramārjitasthandila);
- (v) improper general performance of the fast (samyag ananupālana).
  - 1 Sr (V) 480-9 2 DhB m 36 3 YS m. 118.

The second schema is more convenient as a basis for the present study:

- excreting without examining and sweeping the spot (apratyupeksitäpramäriitotsarea):
  - (ii) picking up or laying down an object without examining and sweeping the spot (apratyupeksitäpramārjitādāna-niksepa);
  - (iii) making one's bed without examining and sweeping the spot
  - (apratyupekṣitāpramārjita-samstāra); (iv) lack of zeal in performance (anādara);
  - (v) forgetfulness (smrty-anupasthāpana).

The atteāras as here presented are clearly modelled on those given for the sāmāynka-vrata with which the poşadhoparāsa is closely associated. It is of course the Tatteārtha-sātra* that is responsible for the innovation and it is from this work that Haribhadra and, in his wake. Hemacandra have borrowed it.

- (i) APRATUPERSITAPRAMARJITOTSARGA. A suitable spot of ground must be chosen, examined, and swept either with a monk's broom (rajo-harana) or with the flap of one's garment before voiding faeces, urine, spittle, or any bodily discharge. The Svetämbara writers specify that neither must there be a failure to do this nor must it be done distractedly (udbirānta-cetatā), if the destruction of living organisms by the dropped excreta is to be avoided.
- (ii) APRATUPEKŞITĀPRAMĀŞITĀDĀNA-NIKSEPA. SIddhasena Gaŋni' understands by this the picking and laying down of stucks, boards, stools, and similar objects without the due precautions already mentioned. Pūjyapāda and Cāmunḍarāya² explain this attačra as the handling of objects used in the fina-pājā or in the obeisance to the guru such as perfumes, garlands, sandalwood paste, and incense or of articles of personal use such as pots and pans and clothing. The word mksepa does not always figure in the nomenclature of the atacāra but according to Hernacandra¹ is always implied. Although this atācāra is missing from the traditional Svetāmbara list the ācāryas, taking śayyā and sthanḍala as upala-kanas, resent it as included.
- (iii) APRATYUPEKŞITĀPRAMĀRJITA SAMSTĀRA. Haribhadra,4 defining the śayyā or samstāra as 'consisting of darbha grass,

&lt;sup>1</sup> T (S) vii 29
<sup>2</sup> CS, p. 12. YŚ iii. 118.

<sup>4</sup> Ås (H), p. 836b

kuia grass, blankets, or clothes', says that pratilekhana is obligatory before going to bed, before lyng down agan after easing nature, before strewing grass on the ground, and indeed before entering the posadha-ŝālā. As in the case of the two preceding aticāras inspection and cleaning are everywhere held to be essential before mats and garments are spread on the ground. Hemacandra's points out that in the designations of these three aticāras the negatives are used in a pejorative sense just as the term abrāhmaṇa is applied contemptiously to an unworthy brahmin.

- (iv) ANADARA For Siddhasena Ganin2 this means a lack of zeal, and for Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāya3 more expressly a lack of zeal expressed in failure to perform the necessary duties (āvašvaka) owing to the travail of hunger. To this aticara corresponds the samvay ananupalana of the traditional Svetambara list defined by Haribhadras as a 'failure to carry out the fast according to the ritual with unflinching mind'. In this connexion Abhavadevas and Siddhasena Suri give the following elucidation. Vexed by hunger and thirst whilst performing the posadhopavāsa the layman thinks, "Tomorrow I shall have an excellent meal cooked, with ghrta-pūrna cakes and other delicacies and shall drink grape-juice and other refreshing drinks. I shall bathe and anoint myself and make my toilet with saffron paste and comb my hair elegantly, if it is hot I shall sprinkle myself with water.' Thus he continues to desire the pleasures of the senses and to recall with lascivious words and gestures the joys of venery and to ponder on the problems of worldly business which will confront him, so that there is no virtue in his fast. Devendra,6 in the Śrāddha-dina-krtya, records a divergent designation for this atuāra bhoranābhora ('the enjoyment of food'), which, by taking bhojana as an upalaksana, he interprets in the same way.
- (v) SMRTY-ANUFASTHĀPANA. Siddhasena Ganm¹ explains this as 'inability to remember whether one has or has not performed the posadhoparöxa or whether one is or is not to perform it'. This is a fatal defect as the attainment of mokṣa is rooted in mindfliness. For the Digambrars this attiran is no more than lack of concentration and Ašādhara¹ in fact applies to it the name anaibāgṛya 'an unsteadiness of the mind in fulfilling the necessary duties'.

As in other cases Somadeva<sup>1</sup> has a very personal interpretation of this vrata. He holds the five aticāras to he: failure to examine the ground (anavekṣā), failure to sweep the ground (anavekṣā), failure to sweep the ground (anavekṣā), atilure to sweep the ground (anavekṣā), and failure to carry out the necessary duties (âvariwaha-virath).

The commentators show considerable interest in whether a of sweeping the ground, which is an essential part of the popadho-paväsa. Hartbhadra, Siddhasena Gaṇin, Hemacandra, and the Digambaras do not refer to the question but the other Svetāmbaras all mention its use. Abhayadeva* and Yaśodeva discuss the point at some length quoting the Āvaiyaha Cārni and other texts. If the layman who is making the posadhopaväsa is with a sādhu he is to ask him for his rajo-harana, if he is at home he will use a rajo-harana if one is a vailable, if not, the end of his garment.

THE DĀNA-VRATA (VAIYĀVŖTTYA-VRATA, ATITHI-SAMVIBHĀGA-VRATA)

This wrata covers the most important single element in the practice of the religion for, without almsgiving by the laity, there could be no ascetics and therefore no transmission of the sacred doctrine. But dâma in its largest sense may include the giving of one's daughters to wife and the transmission of property to one's heirs (in other words questions of marriage and succession), the exercise of charity to relieve want even outside one's own community (a form of ahmsa), the construction of temples and communal institutions such as posadha-alias, and even the performance of pajā (viewed as the giving of flowers, incense, flagstaffs, and similar offerings to the Jina). In the categories used to elaborate the doctrine dâma also figures as one of the six harmans to be carried out continually by the layman and as one of the constituents of the fourfold dharma.

The designation usually applied to this vrata is atthi-samvibhaga

&lt;sup>1</sup> Handigui, p. 283. <sup>2</sup> P (A) 29.

('sharing with the guest'). The word authi has in fact been specialized by the Jainas to signify a sādhu on has almsround and is explained to mean 'one who has no tithi', i.e. who is unfettered by the fixed dates—the param days or the festivals (uttava)—which are important in the secular life. Samantabhadra replaces the term attihi-samathbāga by wayārrttya which is more generally used to indicate the physical services rendered by laymen or monks to other monks in need. Kundakunda and Kārtthkeya prefer the form attihi-pūjā and Amṛtacandra attihi-dāna, whilst Somadeva is alone in employing the simple expression dāna.

Though agreeing on essentials Svetämbaras and Digambaras differ considerably in their formulation of the subject. It is generally recognized that five factors have to be considered:

- (1) the recipient (pātra),
- (u) the giver (datr);
- (iii) the thing given (dātavya, dravya),
- (iv) the manner of giving (dāna-vidhi);
  (v) the result of giving (dāna-phala).

The first four of these are set out in a separate sūtra at the end of the seventh adhyāya of the Tatteārtha-sūtra. Pūyyapāda, commenting on this, states that the recipient is of superlative quality if possessed of attributes which lead to moksa, the giver if devoid of envy and dejection, the thing given if it conduces to study and religious austerities, the manner of giving if the atith is welcomed with fitting reverence. He adds that the excellence of the reward is proportionate to these qualities just as a rich harvest depends on the fertility of the soil, the grade of the seed, and smillar factors.

The Svetambaras regard dāna as conditioned by five factors to which it must be appropriate (the enumeration is canonical and is found in all their śrāvakācāra texts from the Śrāvaka-prajňapti onwards):

- place (deśa), i.e whether the area produces rice or wheat or other cereals or pulses.
- (ii) time (kāla), i.e. whether there is famine or abundance;
- (iii) faith (śraddhā), i.e. whether the giver is in a state of purity of mind;

- (iv) respect (satkāra), i.e. whether due attention is shown to the atithi:
- (v) due order (krama), e.g. whether the boiled rice (odana) or the rice gruel (peya) is offered first.

The Tattoārtha-bhāzya refers to these factors as the valhi and siddhasena Gaṇin¹ interprets them rather differently from the other āādnyas. For him the mention of defa means that the spot must be free of sthāvara-jivas and traua-jīvas, kala implies a mealitme by day and not by inght or a suitable occasion for offering clothes and begging bowl, iraddhā signifies a desire to give alms, whilst by krama are intended the traditional usages of a country in such matters as apparel or else the classification of pātras into uttama, madihyama, and jaghanya. Like the other Svetāmbaras he understands by sathāra what the Digambaras call the punyas.

With this goes a conventional description? enjoining that the alms offered must be nyayāgada ('righteously acquired' by oneself or by one's forebears and not the product of reprehended occupations) and kalpaniya ('suitable', i.e. in the case of food, in conformity with the canonical prescriptions as to what may be eaten); and that they must be given with deep devotion, in the consciousness that it is the atthin who confers rather than receives a favour. In fact, as the Tattvertha-sitina' asya, dana is an outpouring of one's substance to benefit both the recipient who takes food and drink and the giver who finds the recompense of his action in another life.

To return to the five topics enumerated by Vasunandin both Svetāmbaras and Digambaras recognize a classification set out in full by Amṛṭacandṛa, 4 Amitagati, 5 Vasunandin, 6 and Āṣādhara into three or, if the undesirable types are included, five pātras:

- (i) the best recipient (ultama-pātra)—a Jaina ascetic (sakalavirata);
- (ii) the next best recipient (madhyama-pātra)—a Jaina layman who is mounting the ladder of the pratimās (viratāvirata);
- (iii) the least satisfactory recipient (jaghanya-pātra)—a nonpractising layman who has the right belief (avirata-samyagdrst1);

```
<sup>1</sup> T (S) v<sub>11. 34</sub> (p 119)

<sup>2</sup> T (S) v<sub>11. 33</sub>,

<sup>3</sup> T (S) v<sub>11. 33</sub>,

<sup>4</sup> PASU 171.

<sup>5</sup> Sr (A) x. 1-38,

<sup>6</sup> Sr (V) 221-3.
```

- (iv) a poor recipient (ku-pātra)—a person of righteous life but without right belief (samyaktva-vivarjita);
- (v) a wrong recipient (a pātra)—a person devoid of right belief and of all good qualities, delighting in meat, alcohol, and honey (samyaktva-sila-vrata-varnta).

Somadeva' seems to be the originator of another classification of the pātras designed to put a premium on erudition:

- (1) ascetics and laymen who are the support of the faith (samayin);
- (ii) astrologers and specialists in other sciences of practical utility (sādhaha),<sup>2</sup>
- (III) orators, debaters, and littérateurs (samaya-dipaka or samaya-dyotaka).
- (iv) ascetics and laymen who have accomplished austerities and observe the mūla-guṇas and uttara-guṇas (naisthika, sādhu),
- (v) leaders of the community in the field of religion (gaṇādhipa, sūrī).

Aśādhara* has incorporated this classification into his own work, slanting it slightly by substituting naishinka for sādhu and gaṇādhipa for sān, since both these terms may he understood to cover laymen as well as ascetics

Somadevas seems also to be responsible for a general classification of dāna not found elsewhere except as a quotation in the commentary to the Sāgāra-dharmāmrta o

- sāttvika—alms offered to a worthy recipient by a giver possessed of the seven dātr-gunas;
- (ii) rājasa—alms offered in self-advertisement for momentary display and in deference to the opinion of others,
- (iii) tāmasa—alms offered through the agency of slaves or servants without considering whether the recipient is good or worthy or unworthy and without showing marks of respect.

Of these the first is the best and the last the worst. Here as elsewhere Somadeva shows his indebtedness to vedāntist influences.

I Handiqui, p. 284.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The meaningless śrāvaka of the printed text should certainly be emended to idhaka

&lt;sup>3</sup> These pātras cover the same categories of individuals as those listed by Hemacandra as prabhāvakas (p. 45)

<sup>4</sup> SDhA 11. 51 Handiqui, p 285.

<sup>6</sup> SDhA v. 47

He goes on to explain' that a meritorious ascetic is the most deserving of all pātras but where no sādhu is available charity may be given to any co-religionist. To test the worthiness of the recipient is unnecessary since the mere act of giving purifies the layman; he will in any event have to disburse money, and dāma is the best way of employing his wealth. Almsgiving to adherents of other faiths can do little good, and they should never be entertained in one's own house as their presence there might vitiate the ritual of the nine panyax. In particular a rigorous ban is placed on all contact with Buddhists, Cārvākas, Sarwas, and Ajīvākas.

The Digambaras have established a list of qualities which should be manifested in a giver. These seven dātr-guṇas are:

- (i) faith (śraddhā)—confidence in the result attained by the alms given,
- (ii) devotion (bhakti)—love for the virtues embodied in the recipient;
- (111) contentment (tusti)—joy in giving;
- (iv) zeal (sattea)—even when one is not rich, that energy in practising dāna which excites the admiration of the very rich.
  - (v) discrimination (vijñāna)—awareness of what is fit or unfit to be given;
- (vi) disinterestedness (lobha-parityāga, alubdhatā, alaulya)—lack of desire for worldly reward,
- (vii) forbearance  $(ksam\bar{a})$ —absence of anger even when there are grounds for it.

Such is the list given by Devasena, Amitagati, and Cāmuṇḍarāya. A less developed Śvetāmbara version of this is found in Siddhasena Gaṇin's commentary on the Tatvārtha-sūtra: straddhā, sattva, vitrṣnatā, kṣamā, vinaya, śakti.

Another Svetāmbara version is given in the Tattvārtha-bhāşya:6

- (i) absence of ill will towards the recipient (anasuyā) (anasuyatva)
- (II) absence of dejection in giving (avisāda) (avisāditva)
- (iii) absence of condescension towards the recipient (aparibhāvitā) (nirahankāritva)
- <sup>1</sup> Handiqui, pp. 284-5.
  <sup>2</sup> BhS (D) 496.
  <sup>3</sup> Sr (A) 1x. 3-10.
  <sup>4</sup> CS, p 14.
  <sup>5</sup> T (S) v11. 33 (p. 117).
  <sup>6</sup> Ibid 34 (p. 120).
  <sup>8</sup> M

(iv) joy in giving (pritt-yoga) (muditea)
(v) auspicious frame of mind (kuśalābhismahtrā)
(vi) lack of desure for worldly resul(dṛṭta-phālmapekstā)
(vii) straightforwardness (nrupadhero) (mikunatatā) dhatva)

(viii) freedom from hankering for another rebirth (andānatva).

The forms given in brackets on the right belong to the list of seven dati-gunas of the Digambara Amptacandra. It is apparent, therefore, that he dati-gunas vary between six and eight in number, with the figure of seven stabilized in the standard list of the later Digambara texts.

Amitagati considers that the best giver is a man who practises the theorem hearing about it, the next best he who practises it because he has seen it carried out, and the least satisfactory he who fails to practise it even though he has both seen and heard of it. Almsgiving is totally ineffective if performed by one who beats or hurts or intimidates others or commits such offences as theft. It must always be accompanied by fair words for, offered ungraciously, it provokes enmittes. If a giver still regards what he has given as his own property all his possessions will be stolen from him by his sons or wives or by theves.

The Digambaras give a fourfold classification of the datavya 3

- (1) shelter to living beings in fear of death (abhava),
- (11) food (āhāra, anna),
- (iii) medicaments (ausadha),
- (iv) knowledge (jñāna)

Naturally this caturvidha-dāna represents a purely conventional division and applies only in part to the atithi-samvibhāga-vrata.

A variant classification of the caturvidha-dāna is given by Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāya 4

- food (bhiksā);
- (ii) religious accessories (dharmopakarana) which fortify the ratna-traya;

- (iii) medicaments (aușadha);
- (iv) shelter (pratisraya).

This schematization of course restricts the concept to almsgiving.

The concept of what may licitly be given varies. As suitable for almagning Haribhadra' recommends food and drink, clothes, almsbowls, and medicaments (ausadha, bhesaja), and expressly excludes money (hiranya). Sidhabana Ganni' enumerates food, clothes, almsbowls, and staves (dandaha). The food should be rice, wheat, or other cereals, excellent of its kind, well-cooked, and well-favoured. Devagupta' lists food such as sweetments, drink such as milk or grape-juice, clothes, almsbowls, medicaments, blankets, and lodgring (dayyā explained as vasati). Abhayadeva't and Yaśodeva repeat Haribhadra's list of dātavya again insisting that no money may be given.

Hemacandras remarks that it is sometimes suggested that there is no canonical authority for dang in any form other than food and drink and goes on to quote texts permitting the offering of clothes, blankets, bedding, rajo-haranas, and other necessary accessories, to ascetics. Such gifts are justified because the monk is thereby enabled through care for his body to pursue the religious life. Clothes obviate the need to seek the warmth of a fire which would destroy brushwood and they help him to concentrate his mind on śukla-dhyāna and avoid the disturbance of sickness. The use of an almsbowl makes it easier for him to avoid swallowing food which is impure or water in which there are minute forms of aquatic life It is irrelevant to say that there is no record of the tirthankaras possessing clothes or almsbowls and that accordingly their disciples do not need them, since by their supernatural knowledge the Iinas can distinguish between tainted and untainted food and between sterile water and water containing living creatures, and so do not need almsbowls. Again when sādhus are obliged to go outside during the rainy season the blanket helps to avoid the destruction of ap-kayas whilst the merciful purpose of the rajoharana is too well known to need description. Similarly the mukhavastrikā serves to preserve sampātima-nvas, saves vāvu-kāvas from perishing in the stream of hot air emanating from the mouth, and prevents prthvi-kāyas entering in the form of dust. In the rainy season, too, the use of planks (phalaka) and stools (pipha) to le and sit on is essential, since it is forbidden to lie on ground which is covered with mould (panaka) and tiny living creatures (kunthu), whilst bedding is required in the hot and cold seasons. Most beneficial to the life of the ascetics is the provision of lodging, for an upairaya furnishes them with food and drink and clothing and beds at the same time, and protects them from cold and heat, and threves, and stinging insects. In fact it can be said that there is no objection to any article required for the religious life and the giving of such articles is therefore mertrorous.

Hemacandra<sup>1</sup> is equally explicit in his definition of undesirable gifts (ku-dana) Gold and silver inflame the passions of anger, greed, and lust, iron provokes the death of living beings, sesamum seeds afford a breeding ground for the spontaneous generation of living organisms. Nor can there be any merit in the gift of a cow which destroys living creatures with its hooves, eats unclean things (even though its dung is esteemed holy), and is the cause of suffering to its calf each time it is milked, go-dang is therefore a form of mudhata, of foolish superstition. Similarly kanya-dana the gift of a daughter in marriage cannot be regarded as meritorious. whatever fools may think, even the dowry given at a wedding is no more than an oblation that falls in the dust, for a woman is the key to the door that leads to an evil destiny and hars the way of salvation, it is she who steals away the treasure of the religious life. Offerings to the spirits of the ancestors are equally vain, those who seck to nourish the dead are in effect watering a wooden club in the belief that it will sprout into growth. It is absurd to imagine that the ancestors will derive sustenance from food given to brahmins. Offerings made or ascetic practices pursued by a son cannot absolve a parent from sin. Special condemnation is reserved for the offering of meat to recipients of alms.

Devendra' recommende as licit alms for a sūdhu, in addition to the fourfold aliments, medicaments, clothes, woollen or cotton, almsbowls, books, staves of wood or bamboo, blankets, and rajo-haranas. But the best of all forms of dāna is the gift of a dwelling-place (wasarh) for in addition to food and shelter this gives the possibility for study and meditation and development of the rightcous life.

Among Digambara ācārvas Amitagati<sup>1</sup> furnishes the fullest information about what may or may not be given. Forbidden objects include anything by which a living being may be killed, by which harmful activities may be provoked, through which misfortune is occasioned or disease spread, or as a result of which fear is inspired or the recipient ruined. There is an express ban on the gift of land -the earth is compared to a pregnant woman whose foetus, represented by the iivas living within it, is destroyed by ploughing-and houses, as in them harmful activities which prolong the cycle of transmigration are carried on. The other items on his list are virtually the same as those enumerated by Hemacandra; iron, gold, money, sesamum seed, meat, kanvā-dāna (marriage is the concentration of all harmful activities) offerings to the pitr, and go-dana (the cow is the object of false beliefs and is given by people who follow a false path). Licit dana2 on the other hand includes anything which destroys disease, has a beneficial effect for another person or strengthens devotion to religion, and in addition to the caturvidha-dāna, clothes, almsbowls, and shelter (āiraya) as distinct from landed property.

Somadeva, after listing the caturvidha-dana, remarks, in connevin with Athara-dana, that food offered as alms should not have been touched by evil persons or consecrated to dreas or Yakşas; nor should it have been bought in the market or be prepared with unscasonable commodities. Pood, shelter, and books are to be supplied to the monks so that they can devote themselves to study and meditation which are impossible without comforts. Physical toil and the career of arms demand less effort from a man than intellectual concentration.

In contrast to Somadeva, who mentions only the caturevalha-dāma to ascetics, Vasunandné repoins the giving of food not only to the monk on his almsround, but to the very young and the very old, the blind, the dumb, and the deaf, strangers from another land, and sick people; this is the practice of karuna-dāma. To all who are weakened by disease, fasting, fatigue, or anxiety, salutary medicines are to be given. Jāma-dāma implies arranging for the study and recitation of the scriptures as well as the distribution of texts that have been copied out.

In the treatment of ku-dāna Āśādhara propounds certain

&lt;sup>1</sup> Śr (A) 1x. 44-69. <sup>3</sup> Handiqui, p. 284.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Sr (A) ix 81-107. <sup>4</sup> Sr (V) 235-7.

distinctions. In agreement with Amitagati he lays down that a naisthika layman may give nothing that is prejudicial to right conduct and right belief. Offerings to the spirits of the ancestors, donations of lands to brahmins for the performance of special ceremonies, gifts made to ward off untoward consequences at eclipses of the sun or moon, and astrological conjunctions all come under this ban. It applies also to gifts of land and gold on the occasion of the marriage of a daughter where the recipients may make evil use of them so that in general the ku-dana for a naisthika includes land, houses. iron, cattle, and horses. However, a pāksika layman is not only not forbidden but is enjoined to give his daughter and with her lands, house, gold, jewels, horses, elephants, and carriages to suitable co-religionists. Such kanyā-dāna is a form of sama-datti.2 As an expression of karuna-dana? one should support those who are in need because they have no livelihood, whether or not they are one's dependants, by giving them food by day, and water, betel, cardamums, and medicines even by night.

The primary form of dāna is of course food and as an ascetic must live by begged food it must always be the most important. The Drādadamprekār affirms that the giving of food embodies all gifts since the diseases of hunger and thirst occur every day. It preserves life and through the strength given by it vādhus study the scribities night and day.

The abhaya-dāna, extolled as the noblest of all grits and repeatedly illustrated by the famous apologues of the four queens and the robber, is only in name a form of dāna and belongs properly to the sphere of ahmsā

Successive Svetämbara writers's give a ritual for dāma quoted from the Aesiyaha Girmi When a layman has completed the posadhoparāra he is under an obligation to feed monks before he breaks his fast but at other times he may eat either before or after the almsgrung. When the mealtime approaches he puts on his best clothes and ornaments and goes to the sādhus' lodging to invite them to come and accept laims. If able to, they accept and two of them—one should not go alone—return with him, walking in front with the layman behind them. Directing them to his house he in-

SDhA vi. 53 2 SDhA ii. 56-57 3 SDhA 75-76.

• KA 363-4.
• A summary of this tale in English is to be found in Jacobi's introduction to his edition of the Samaraditya-katha The Prakrit text appears on pp. 785-7.

6 e.g. YS iii 87 (pp. 526-7).

vites them to sit down. Either he himself gives them food and drink or else he holds the platter whilst his wife offers the alms. Then he makes obeisance to them and accompanies them for a few steps as they leave, after which he may take food himself. If there are no zādhus in the village where he lives he should go to the door when it is time to eat and look carefully in all directions giving expression to the pious wish: 'If only there were zādhus then I should find the way to salvation (nustario bhavisyam).' The layman should in any event only consume the same food as has been offered to the monks, but the food should not have been specially prepared for them, though what is given must be of the best quality.

Devendra' describes the layman as making pājā to the household images when the time to eat comes. Having prepared the best gruel he invites the aādhus, and as soon as he espies them coming towards his house he goes to meet them. Surrounded by his house hold he makes obessance to them. Then like a physician to a sick man he should apply the treatment of dāna, taking into consideration time and place and circumstances (amaithā—explained as 'whether there is famine or abundance'), and the individual (purus explained as signifying whether he is ācārya, upādhyāya, young, old, in good or in ill health). These elements recall the five factors listed earlier as conditioning the grupp of alms.

The Digambaras treat the ritual (dāna-vudhi) as made up of nine elements termed punyas: these are mentioned by Kārttikeya and Samantabhadra and enumerated by Vasunandin, Āśādhara, and Vāmadeya as fullows:

- reception (pratigraha, sthāpana)—seeing the monk at the door of his house or inviting him from a distance the layman should welcome him with the words: Namo 'stu tiṣṭha;
- (ii) giving a seat of honour (ucca-sthāna, yogyāsana)—if he accepts the proffered alms he is to be brought into the house and led to the best scat;
- (III) washing the feet(andhri-kṣālana, caraṇa-kṣālana, pādodaka) —his feet are then reverently washed;
  - (iv) worship (arcana)—the layman then pours the pādodaka (water in which the feet have been washed) on his own head and makes pājā to the sādhu with perfumes, flowers, aksata, nauvedya, incense, fruits, and lamps;

<sup>1</sup> SrDK 171-5.

 (v) obeisance (ānatı, pranāma)—next after putting on him a garland of flowers and reciting the pañca-namaskāra he bows down to him;

For the act of dana purity under four aspects is necessary, the first three referring to the donor

- (vi) purity of mind (manah-śuddhi)—freedom from ārta-dhyāna and raudra-dhyāna;
- (vii) purity of speech (vacana-śuddh)—the avoidance of harsh words.
- (viii) purity of body (kāya-suddhi)—firm control of the senses;
  - (ix) purity of food (anna-suddhi).

The sixth, seventh, and eighth items of this list represent another manifestation of the familiar category of the tri-yoga—mind, speech, and body.

The impurities of food (punda-dors) in other words the defects that preclude its acceptance as alms by monks form a canonical category familiar both to Svetāmbaras and Digambaras. They belong rightly to the field of yaty-dara but are enumerated by some writers on the lay life. A figure of fourteen is usually set for them though a late Digambara writer, Vāmedeva' notes sixteen. Here is the list as given in a verse quoted by Vasunandin from the Mildara 2 nails, living organisms, bones, excrement, hair, specks of dirft, meat, blood, skin, tubers, roots, fruits, seeds, and particles of grain.

In their developed form as a category of nine the punyar are peculiar to the Digambaras; however, the Svetämbaras include the same elements under what they term sathāra. Thus Haribhadra' mentions standing up (abhyutthāna), oftering a seat (āsana-pradīna), worship (randāma), and following the departing guest (amurajāna). To these Siddhasena Ganin' adds massaging the feet (caraṇapramārjāna) the final ādi indicating that the enumeration is not complete. Siddhasena Ganin' notes that any gift may be either

- (1) solicited (prerita) like the food begged by a sādhu; or
- (ii) accepted (anumata) like the clothes given to an acarya who, desirous to show favour to the giver, approves the offering made; or

&lt;sup>1</sup> Bh (V) 530 <sup>2</sup> Mülācara, 484. <sup>1</sup> Āv (H), p. 837b <sup>2</sup> T (S) vu. 16 (p. 94) <sup>3</sup> Ibid, 34 (p. 118).

(iii) not rejected (anirākrta) like the offerings of flowers or incense made to the Jina.

As a postcript to the discussion of the dataevya it is worth noting that a fifteenth-century writer Ratnaékhara' distinguishes three types of licit dāna: first, the fourfold aluments; secondly, clothes, almsbowl, blanket, and rajo-harana; and thirdly such articles as needles (tār), sewing-thread (ppsplaka), nail-cutters, and earcleaners. In his view' there should be annually a presentation of certain articles including clothes, blankets, rajo-harana, thread, wool, almsbowls, jugs (udanhaka), water jars (tumbaka), staves, needles, and puns (kantaka)

The insistence on the results of dāma is proportionate to its preemimence among religious duties. Like other meritorious acts it can contribute to the extinction of karma or to the amassing of a favourable karma or may find requital in the present life. Even though the scriptures teach that all allmsgiving is vitated if done for worldly fame it is still true, as Vasunandin's says, that the ignorant are loath to perform any action from which they can expect no material result. Samantabhadra' has written that the feeding of ascetics wipes away the karma heaped up by the activities of the household life just as water washes away blood.

Though the older texts mention various auspicious results from almsgiving the Digambaras' oome more and more to associate dana with rebirth in the fary-tale world of the bhoga-bhūmis. In fact a regular equation is established: gifts to an uttama-pātra bring rebirth in an uttama-bhoga-bhūmi, to a ku-pātra in ak bhoga-bhūmi, and so on, whilst gifts to an apātra lead to no result whatever; Amitagati, Vasunandin, Āśādhara, Devasena all dwell on this theme. The Svetāmbaras do not seem to regard this kind of reincarnation as having any special connexion with dāna.

Amptacandra,<sup>5</sup> concerned as always to stress the unique importance of ahimsa and its permeation of every virata, affirms that, since acquisitiveness (labha) which is a manifestation of himsā is overcome by dāma, almagiving bringa about a cessation of himsā. That man is full of lobhā who fails to feed the monk who comes to his house like a bee in flight without causing injury in his path.

```
<sup>1</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 161a <sup>2</sup> Śr (V) 239. <sup>3</sup> RK 1V. 24.

• Śr (A) x1 62–88; Śr (V) 239–70, BhS 497–533 <sup>5</sup> PASU 172–4
```

The atteāras of the attthr-samvubhāga-vrata are enumerated similarly by all writers, Śvetāmbara and Digambara, except Samantabhadra:

- (1) depositing alms on sentient things (sacitta-niksepa),
- (n) covering alms with sentient things (sacitta-pidhāna);
- (iii) transgressing the appointed time (kālātikrama);
- (iv) pretending that the alms belongs to others (para-tyapadesa);
- (v) jealousy in almsgiving (matsaritā).

Samantabhadra<sup>1</sup> replaces the third aticāra by anādara (lack of respect) a vague term taken from the sāmāyika- and posadhopavāsa-tratas

- (i) SACITTA-NIKSEPA. Siddhasena Ganna explains this as the depositing of the licit fourfold alments on sentient uncooked grains of rice, wheat, or barley with the intention of avoiding almsgiving since such dāna, though offered, cannot be accepted by the sādni; thus the fame of an almsgiver will be obtained at no cost. Haribhadra¹ takes the same view. Abhayadeva¹ and Yaśodeva interpret as 'depositing on the earth' (which is full of prihti-laōyas¹). Hemacandra¹ offers the choice of both explanations Pijayapāda¹ and Cāmunḍañya consider that the aticāra refers to the placing of food on a lotus leaf or other leaf, this would be a mistake on the giver's part but not necessarily evidence of a niggardiy intention. Ašādhara² suggests that it may mean 'depositing on the ground, on water or on plant leaves'
- (ii) SACLITA-FIDHANA. The Svetāmbaras all interpret this in the same way covering the alms offered with fruit, leaves, flowers, or roots with the same intention as in the previous arteara. The Digambaras Pūjyapāda and Cāmundarāyas speak only of lotus leaves
- (iii) KALATIRRAMA The Svetämbaras understand by this the offering of dāna either when the time has passed for the monks to eat or when the time has not yet come, so that in either case they are obliged to refuse. As before, the covert intention is to avoid almsgrumg Haribhadra, *in fact, quotes a verse to the effectivate the real value of grung hes in giving at the right time. The Digambaras describe this attain as 'offering alms at an unfitting time'.

- (iv) PARA-VYAPADEŚA. For Haribhadra¹ and Siddhasena Gaṇin² this implies an artifice of the following kind: if a monk arrives in quest of alms at the time that a layman is breaking his fast after the posadhopavāsa he is merely told 'this does not belong to us but to someone else' or 'this belongs to so-and-so, go and ask him'. This interpretation is followed by the later Svetāmbaras and by Āsādhara. Pūjiyapāda³ and Cāmunḍarāya suggest that the attcāra consists in offering some other person's alms as if it were one's own.
- (v) MATSARITA. Two possibilities of interpretation are uniformly admitted by the Svetāmbara authorities. Either matiaritā means a state of resentment or anger aroused by the monk's solicitation even though alms are actually given; or a feeling of envy (defined as 'dejection at the excellence of an another person') provoked by the sight of a well-to-do neighbour giving generously. This again will stimulate egoistic emulation. Phipapäda auto-Cämundaräya' understand by matiaritä a lack of respect in almsgiving even though an offering is made. Ašādhara' combines the Svetāmbara and Dipambara versions.

All these offences are atteāras because whatever the artifices adopted the rightness of āāna is never called in question and the external marks of respect for the mendicant which constitute the satkāra are observed; actual impediments to the giving of alms or dejection of mind for that cause would, as Devagupta* points out, constitute a bhanea.

There is another general classification, again Digambara, of the act of giving, in this case more usually termed datt:

- (1) almsgiving (pātra-datti),
- (ii) giving shelter (dayā-dattı) equivalent to abhaya-dāna or karuṇa-dāna;
- (iii) transfer of one's entire property to a son or kinsman before abandoning the lay life (sakala-datti or anvaya-datti);
  - (iv) gifts to equals (sama-daiti) covering such subjects as transfers of property during one's lifetime or the marriage of a daughter.

The distinction of the first and fourth types is inevitably blurred at many points.

```
1 Åv (H), p. 8386.

1 T (P) vii. 36.

2 T (S) vii. 31 (p. 115).

2 T (S) vii. 31 (p. 115).

3 SDhA v. 54.

6 NPP 127.
```

This fourfold datti is perhaps best defined as the treatment given to dana when regarded as one of the six daily duties. The classification introduced, it would seem, by Jinasena<sup>1</sup> is taken up by Camundaraya,2 who is indebted on more than one score to the Mahāpurāna, and later by Āsādhara, and finds a last distant echo in Medhāvin. Of its four elements pātra-datti has already been discussed, dayā-dattı belongs really to ahımsā, and sakala-datti will be dealt with later under the krivas. Sama-datti is defined by Jinasena3 as the giving to an excellent recipient-similar to oneself in respect of kriya, mantra, and vrata-of land, and gold, and horses. and elephants, and chariots, and daughters; such an uttama-patra is styled nistāraka (one who assists or rescues). If no person equal to oneself in these respects is to be found such dana may be made to a madhvama-nātra. Āśādhara* understands by krīvā such ceremonies as the garbhādhāna described in the Mahāpurāna, by mantra the pañca-namaskāra and other ritual formulae, and by vrata the pūja and the mūla-gunas. The distinction between patra-datti and sama-dattı is pointed again by Āsādharas in a verse which proclaims that a dharma-patra is to be entertained for the sake of one's well-being in a future life and a karva-patra for the sake of one's repute in this world. Kanyā-dāna, so strongly condemned by Hemacandra or by Amitagati,6 is extolled on the other hand from the angle of sama-datti as the path to happiness in this world, since a wife, says Aśadhara,7 punning in a way that reflects a turn of phrase of the neo-Indian languages, is called a house (grha), but a mere mass of walls and matting cannot be called a house.

The question how much of one's property is to be devoted to dana is raised with increasing frequency in the later texts. The earliest writer to give a clear-cut answer to this question seems to have been Devasena,8 who takes the view that a wise man should divide his property into six parts. The first is for the dharma, the second for the upkeep of his family, the third for luxuries (bhoga), the fourth for maintaining his servants, and the fifth and sixth shares together are to be used for performing pina.

It would appear that Hemacandra is the author of a more

MP XXXVIII 35. <sup>2</sup> CS, p. 20 3 MP xxxvin 38-39 4 SDhA 11, 57 5 Ibid 50

<sup>6</sup> Sr (A) 1x. 57-58. <sup>7</sup> SDhA ii 59 The phrase is borrowed from Somadeva.

<sup>8</sup> BhS (D) 578-80 Other views on the proper distribution of one's material wealth are given by Jinamandana (SrGuV, p 346) 9 YS m. 140 (pp 583-95)

schematic presentation of dāna in the form of the seven fields (ksētrā), though the term kṣētrā at least is older for Haribhadra uses it twice in the Dharma-binda: wibhavocitam vidhinā kṣētrā-dānam¹ 'give alms in proportion to one's substance, and in accordance with the ritual, to the kṣētrā-a' and vitarāga-sādhavah kṣētrā-a' 'the kṣētrā is made up of those who excel in the law of the Jina'. The commentator here explains kṣētrā as 'a recipient worthy to be given lams'. Hemacandrā describes as an illustrious disciple (māhā-irāvakā) the man who abides by the vratas and sows his wealth on the seven fields with compassion for those in great misery.¹ The seven fields with compassion for those in great misery.¹ The seven fields with compassion for those in great misery.¹ The seven fields with compassion for those in great misery.¹

- (i) Jama images (Jina-bimba)—wealth is sown on them by setting them up, by performing the eightfold pūjā, by taking them in procession through the city, by adorning them with jewels, and by dressing them with fine clothes.
- Jama temples (Jina-bhavana)—new ones are to be built and old ones restored.
- (iii) Jaina scriptures (Jināgama)—the copying of the sacred texts and the giving of them to learned monks to commentate.
- (11) Monks (sādhu)—ordinary almsgiving.
- (v) Nuns (sādhvi)-ordinary almsgiving.
- (iv) Laymen (!rāvuka)—the inviting of co-religionists to birth and marriage festivals, distributing food, betel, clothes, and ornaments to them, constructing public popadha-sālās and other buildings for them, and encouraging them in religious duties Charity is to be extended to all those who have fallen into evil circumstances.
- (vii) Laywomen (irāvikā)—all the duties under the last head apply equally in respect of women, who are not naturally more perverse than men.

The last four ksetras are the familiar four limbs (catur-anga or catur-varna) of the Jaina community.

Hemacandra* goes on to say that a mahā-śrāvaka should use his wealth indiscriminately to assist all who are in misery or poverty, or who are blind, deaf, crippled, or sick, irrespective of whether recipients or not. Such sowing of one's substance is to be made with limitless compassion but not with devotion (bhakti) as in tatra-dana.

&lt;sup>2</sup> DhB ni 71. <sup>2</sup> Ibid. 73. <sup>3</sup> YŚ ni. 120 (verse). <sup>4</sup> Ibid. (p. 505).

Subsequent Svetämbara writers take over from Hemacandra the seven kietras as a convenient method of treating the subject of dāna and Āšādhara' refers to them when discussing the appropriateness of giving alms to laywomen and nuns.

A later development is apparent in the sangha-pijā or distribution of blankets, cloth, needles, thread, staves, almsbowls, rajoharanas, and other objects useful to an ascetic. Ratnašchhara* and Cāritrasundara* recommend that this should be carried out annually.

THE SALLEKHANA-VRATA

SALLEKHANĀ - generally interpreted as ritual suicide by fasting, the scraping or emaciating of the kasāvas forms the subject of a rrata which, since it cannot by its nature be included among the formal religious obligations, istreated as supplementary to the twelve cratas, however, in a few cases—by Kundakunda, Dea seane, Padmanandun, and Vasunandin—it has been incorporated, rather anomalously, into the twelve as the last shañ-arrata. Early in the Svetämbara tradition the Śrāvaka-prajnāptis expressly states that sullekhanā is not restricted to assecties, but already in the Śrāvaka-dharma-pahcāiakas it is given only a perfunctory mention, it is absent completely from those chapters of the Dhama-bindu which deal with the lay life, even Hemacandra,' despite the amplitude of his coverage of śrāvakācāra, devotes only a very short space to the subject, and after his day the śrāvakācāra texts are in general silent.

The Nova-pada-prakarana* seems to be the only Svetāmbara irācahācāra to treat sallekhanā in detail. It lists the seventeen possible forms of voluntarily chosen death of which three only are permissible for a Jaina * In fact these three are fused together but the name of only one—proprogramman (by the later Svetāmbaras often falsely sanskritzed from Prakrit pāvongamana as pādapa-gamana and vi the Digambaras sometimes abbrevated to pārāva)—

- YS m 149-53 NPP 129-35

For a consideration of these see von Kamptz, Über die vom Sterbefasten handelnden alteren Pannut des Jaina-Kanons, Hamburg, 1929 is retained to become synonymous with sallekhanā itself, which is also often called samādhi-maraņa.

Various reasons may decide a man to perform sallekhanā. The Svetāmbara Tattvārtha-bhāryat mentions time (explained as time of famine), physical weakness (saṃhāmana-daurbalya), calamity (upasarga), and the approach of death which renders the performance of the āraiyahat impossible. Hemacandra insists on this last motivation. Devaguptas suggests that the rite should take place in a Jaina temple or at a kalyāṇa-sthāna (place of birth, ordination, enlightenment, or nīrvāṇa of a tirthanhara), or if this is impracticable, in one's own house (grha) or in the wilderness(araŋya). In default of a kalyāṇa-sthāna (Hemacandra' advocates grha or aranya, but by the former he understands a monks' lodging and by the latter a place of pilgrimage such as Satruñjaa. Whatever the place chosen, the piece of ground on which the prospective suicide is to lie down must be devoid of living organisms and pratilekhana and pramārjana must hav been performed.

For the Svetambaras the actual practice of sallekhanā seems, as in the canonical sources, to begin with a progressive withdrawal of food. The Tattvartha-bhasva1 speaks of a gradually increasing severity of fasting of the avamaudarva type (in which one meal is missed and then another taken) culminating in complete abstinence from food and drink. The Nava-bada-brakarana+ prefers the canonically approved method of first abandoning all solid food and then making the fast complete by extending it to include liquids. The confession of one's faults (alocana) and forgiveness of all offences committed against oneself (ksāmanā) make a man fit for the so-called samstāra-diksā or death-bed consecration expressed in a special form of confession (vikatanā) and reinforcement (uccarana) of the vows (not, however, the administration of the mahā-vratas). His last moments on earth will then be spent in concentration on the pañca-namaskāra and on the catuh-sarana and in meditation on the anupreksas and on all that is covered by the term aradhana. 5 And even in these last moments be will need to be steadfast to withstand the assaults of parisahas and upasargas.6

There are some variations in the presentation of sallekhanā by

&lt;sup>1</sup> T (S) vu. 17 (p 95).

<sup>2</sup> NPP 129.

<sup>3</sup> YŚ m 150.

<sup>4</sup> NPP 131.

<sup>5</sup> YŚ m. 151 (p. 757).

For these see Glasenapp, Der Jamismus p. 207. Hemacandra lists and describes them YS in 153 (pp. 758-61)

the Digambaras, the generally current views being exemplified by Samantabbadra' and Cāmunḍarāya, a who would seem to enjoin the same ritual for layman and ascette. In a rather brief reference Vasunandin' describes a rite appropriate to śrāvakas only; and a distinction between śrāvaka and yast is maintained in Āšūdhara's lone and detailed treatment of the theme.

Samantabhadra4 prescribes sallekhanā when the individual is overcome by calamity (upasarga), famine, old age, or incurable disease. In this last rite (anta-kr va) he is to put aside affection and enmity, and all attachment and acquisitiveness, and then to seek forgiveness of his kin and his household and his friends, at the same time expressing his forgiveness to them in gentle words. Only when he has confessed without any concealment all his transgressions, krta, hārita, or anumata, is he fit to assume the mahā-vratas in their entirety for as long as his life lasts. Abandoning dissatisfaction, sorrow, fear, dejection, and turpitude, and stimulating courage and steadfastness he is to soothe his mind with the nectar of the scriptures. Once he has taken the mahā-vratas he begins the fasting ritual which is in three stages, involving a gradual reduction in the intake, first of solid food, then of fatty liquids (snigdha-pāna). then of acid liquids (khara-pāna), until finally all nourishment is abandoned As he repeats the pañca-namaskāra he is to keep his mind fixed on the five paramesthins until at last he abandons his body

Sallekhanā in Vasunandin's' conception differs little from the Svetāmbara model and does not imply for a layman the assumption of the mahā-vratas. He is to abandon all parigraha except for clothing and after making ālocanā in the presence of a guru is to perform the rite in his own home or in a temple, abstaining first from solid food and then fasting comoletely.

Asiahara* devotes a whole adhyāya to the consideration of acallekhanā and the accompanying anadhanā ineditations and, it would seem, regards it as the normal conclusion of human life except where sudden death makes this impossible. Preparation for it is to be made when the individual is afflicted by old age or calamity and the actual fast will begin when the physical deterioration of the body or omens, obtained from astrological data or from ornithomancy, indicate that the moment has come. He is, if possible, to repair to a place of great sanctity such as a kalyāna-sthāna or else to a Jaina temple, in which case, even if he dies on the way, the intention in his mind will have a very favourable effect on his next reincarnation. Then he is to make alocana to a guru (remaining exempt thereafter from the three salvas) and to forgive all offences against himself He is now fit to receive the mahā-vratas but if he feels a sense of shame either because he has been very rich or because his family are unbelievers or because nudity offends his sense of propriety he may avoid a frequented place and choose a solitary spot for this samstāra-dīksā which entails nakedness.1 In this last hour it is proper even for a woman to divest herself of all clothes 2 For the performance of the death fast external and internal expressions of purity, in each case fivefold, are required; these refer to the following points:3

&lt;sup>1</sup> RK v. 1-7. <sup>2</sup> CS, pp 22-24. <sup>3</sup> Śr (V) 271-2.

EXTERNAL (bāhiranga)

- (1) the bed (samstāra)
- (2) the monkish insignia
- (upadhi)
- the confession (alocana)
- (4) food (anna) (5) vaiyāvrtīya

INTERNAL (antaranga)

right belief (samyag-darśana) right knowledge (samyagıñāna) right conduct (samyakcāritra)

vinava the six avasyakas

Whether the aspirant has taken the mahā-vratas or whether, unable to give up attachment to clothes, he has retained his lay status he is now ready to undertake the fast which is carried out in stages as described by Samantabhadra. In very hot weather or in a desert climate or in the case of certain diseases the dving man may be permitted to go on drinking water almost until the last and only in extrems will be relinquish completely the four aliments.+ Then all those present will stand in the kavotsarpa to promote the successful outcome of this holy death and the guru will whisper in the dying man's ear a few last words of exhortation: 'Vomit forth unbelief and imbibe pure religion, make firm your faith in the linas, have joy in the namaskāra, guard the mahā-vratas, overcome the kaşāyas, tame the sense organs and by yourself see yourself within vourself (ātmānam ātmanātmanı paśva).'5

<sup>2</sup> Ibid, 38. 3 Ibid. 68-60.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. 42-43

Five aticāras are recorded for the sallekhanā- as for other

- (i) desire for a fortunate rebirth as a man (tha-lokāśaṃsā);
- (ii) desire for a fortunate rebirth as a divinity (para-lokāśamsā);
- (iii) desire for continuing life (jīvitāśamsā),
   (iv) desire for death (maranāśamsā);
- (v) desire for death (marajusamsa),
   (v) desire for sensual pleasures (kāma-bhogāśamsā).

For the last aticara of the Svetambaras the Digambaras use the

For the last atteara of the Svetambaras are Digambaras use the term mdāna, already familiar as one of the salyas, which is practically identical with one interpretation of kāma-bhogāsamsā. The first and second infractions are given by the Digambaras as:

- (1) attachment to comfort (sukhānubandha),
- (11) affection for friends (mtrāmirāga).

Samantabhadra¹ is alone in regarding bhaya (fear) as the first attaïa. The Nava-pada-pada-pakarana¹ would consider as a bhanga of sallekhanā any request for food or proposal to eat again, once the fast has been begun.

- (i) JinA-LoxāšāMsā Thas is the desire to be reborn in a human incarnation in which one may onjoy the good things of the world as a guildsman or a king's minister, says Haribhadra, <sup>2</sup> as a universal monarch, suggests Devagupta, <sup>2</sup> or in Hemacandra's <sup>4</sup> phrase, in any position of wealth and fame
- (ii) PARA-LOKĀŠAMSĀ This is the desire to be reborn in the deva-loka and more particularly in a high position among the devas
- (iii) JIVITĀŚAMSĀ The Švetāmbaras³ and Āśādhara⁵ explain this as meaning either a general desire for continuing life or as a wish to go on enjoying the high consideration accorded to a person engaged in the rite of sallekhanā, with many people about him engaged in recting the scriptures and performing euyĕertiya for him and extolling his great qualities. Pujyapāda and Cāmunḍarāya° regard this atiāma as 'reluctance to abandon this body which is as ephemeral as a bubble of water'.
- (iv) Maranasamas This is, for the Svetämbaras, the direct antithesis of the preceding attains. It means that a man conceives the desire to do as quickly as possible because he is disappointed that no one comes to wait on him and pay him respect on his deathbed. Pūjyapāda and Cāmuṇḍarāya understand by it the hope of speedy death in order to put an end to the miseries of disease or calamity.<sup>1</sup>

- (v) KAMA-BHOGÁSAMSA OR NIDANA. The same interpretation<sup>2</sup> may be given to kāma and bhoga as in the fifth atterār of the brahma-erata, but the Svetāmbaras in general<sup>3</sup> specify here a desire for rebrith as a Vāsudeva, or as a very handsome or very rich man. The Digambaras¹ understand by this atterār a desire that the performance of the grum rite of sallebhamā may result in unbounded satisfaction of sensual desires in another uncarnation.
- (i) SUKHĀNUBANDHA. This is to be understood as the recollection of the comforts and the pleasures one has enjoyed in former days.<sup>4</sup>
- (ii) MITRĀNURĀGA. This is the recollection of the friends one has loved, of the games of childhood, of merry festivities, and of shared pleasures of all kinds.

It is not surprising that the duty, or at least the recommended practice, of ritual suicide is an aspect of Jainism that has been remarked and reprobated by non-Jamas. Some acarvas-Amrtacandras and Pujyapada, for example-have therefore felt it necessary to defend sallekhanā. Pūivapāda6 maintains that it cannot be called suicide because of the complete absence of raga which is always present when a person under the sway of passion or hate or delusion poisons or otherwise destroys himself. He compares the layman undertaking sallekhanā to a householder who has stored goods in a warehouse. If danger threatens he tries to save the whole building but if that proves impossible he does his best to preserve at least the goods. The householder's warehouse is the body and his goods the vratas. He does not seek the destruction of his body but if he cannot maintain it he tries at least to safeguard the yows he has taken. Asadhara7 employs a rather similar turn of phrase, it is the dharma, he says, which fulfils the desires of the necessarily perishing body; the body itself is recuperable in another incarnation but the dharma is very hard to recover. Sallekhanā alone, according to Amrtacandra.8 will enable a man in dving to take away with him all his stock of dharma.

```
<sup>1</sup> T (P) viii. 37.
<sup>2</sup> UD 57.
<sup>3</sup> YŚ iii 152.
<sup>4</sup> CS, p. 24.
<sup>5</sup> PASU 177-80.
<sup>6</sup> T (P) viii 22.
<sup>7</sup> SDhA viii. 7.
<sup>8</sup> PASU 175.
```

The underlying motive for sallekhanā is perhaps best put by Aśadhara: I if at the hour of death there is an offence against the dharma a lifetime of religious observance and meditation will be vain, but if the final meditation is pure even deeply encrusted sin will be eradicated 2 It is the physical weakness and the mental delusion that are often associated with old age or grave infirmity that provoke the evil forms of dhyana and make it difficult or impossible to keep up the daily āvasyakas that help to make firm the mind. A healthy body is to be guarded from disease but one that fails to respond to treatment is to be rejected just as an evil man is shunned by the good.3 In such circumstances it is easier to let the body waste away than to attempt to maintain the religious life; and sallekhanā will be, in Hemacandra's vivid phrase, in some sort an udvāpana5 for the whole śrāvaka-dharma.

And when this body, which is like a withering leaf or like a lamo in which the oil is running low,6 is at last abandoned, there is hope that the niva may burst asunder the cage of existence or at least abridge by many hundreds of incarnations his wanderings in the samsara.7 In default of moksa, it is abundantly stressed, the correct practice of sallekhanā will certainly lead to rebirth in the deva-loka.

THE PRATIMAS

THE eleven stages of spiritual progress—the word pratima means a statue and is used in another specifically Jaina sense to designate the kavotsarea-have been described by Schubring8 as, so to speak, a vertical projection of the horizontally conceived vratas; their enumeration would represent partly a theoretical graduation and partly the possibility of choice. The medieval acarvas, however, quite plainly conceive of the pratimas as forming a regular progressing series in Amitagati's words, a sopāna-mārga, a ladder on each rung of which the aspirant layman is to rest for a number of months proportionate to its place on the list before he is fit to

SDhA vin 16

<sup>2</sup> For some literary parallels illustrating the significance of the hour of death, see K Bruhn, Šīlānkas Cauppannamahāpurisacariya, pp 107-8.

<sup>3</sup> SDhA vm 4. 4 YS ni 149 (p. 755). For the meaning of this word see p 231 supplement and reinforce his achievement by the practice of the succeeding stage.

<sup>6</sup> Handigui, p 287

<sup>7</sup> SDhA viii 28 Schubring, Die Lehre der Jamas, pp. 180-1.

The pratimas are listed below in the Svetämbara (including the Avasyaka Cürni) and the Digambara enumerations, which diverge slightly:

	SVETĀMBARA	DIGAMBARA	Avasyaka-Cürni
(1)	darśana	darśana	darśana
(2)	vrata	vrata	vrata
(3)	sāmāyika	sāmāyıka	sāmāyıka
(4)	posadha	posadha	posadha
(5)	käyotsarga	sacıtta-tyäga	rătrı-bhojana-parijñă
	abrahma-varjana	rätri-bhakta	sacıtta-tyaga
(7)	sacitta-tyāga	abrahma-varjana	diva-brahmacarya
	ārambha-tyāga	ārambha-tyāga	divo-rātrı-brahmacarya
(q)	presva-tvāga	parigraha-tyāga	ārambha-tyāga
(10)	uddista-tyāga	anumatı-tyaga	presya-tyäga
	śramaņa-bhūta	uddisţa-tyaga	uddışta-tyaga-śramana- bhūta

The differences in these lists are more apparent than real and in fact concern two points; the position of sacitta-tvaga in the series and the insertion of parigraha-tvaga by the Digambaras. What is called the kāyotsarga-pratimā or pratimā-pratimā embraces a provision for continence by day and moderate sexual congress by night, in other words it is equivalent to the ratri-bhakta-pratima as understood by the majority of Digambaras. The point at issue therefore is simply whether the cessation of sexual relations is to precede or to follow the abandonment of sacitta foodstuffs. Not even all the Digambaras are in agreement here for Somadeva reverses the positions of sacitta-tyana and arambha-tyana in the table. In regard to the second point the Digambaras would seem, even if they have deliberately inserted the parigraha-tyaga, to have eliminated the sramana-bhūta only in name, for from the time, at least, of Vasunandin onwards, the eleventh pratima is divided into two grades to which in modern times the terms ailaka and ksullaka are attached and the second of which seems to correspond to the canonical descriptions of the sramana-bhūta.

In reality the most important divergence on the list is that which the nomenclature conceals: whether the rātri-bhakta-pratimā is to be interpreted as the restriction of sexual relations to the night time or as the abandoment of eating by night. In view of the commentators' descriptions of the kāyotsarga-pratimā there is little reason to question the former explanation and it would seem probable that Kārttikeya and Samantabhadra' (in this as in so many other matters an innovator) were led to their view by the ambiguity of the term bhakta and by the importance ascribed to the avoidance of ineith eating.

The Deadasiamupreksa* is exceptional in referring to twelve stages of the lay life, the first praxima implying the possession of samyaktva and the second the avoidance of the grosser faults (thilla-dojas) such as drinking alcohol (in effect the practice of the milla-gunas). Generally the Digambaras regard both of these qualifications as implicit in the dariana-pratima. Kärttikeya lists the remaining pratimas in their normal Digambara order.

In the following discussion of the individual pratimās the Svetāmbara view will be represented by the Pratimā-paicāidaka and by Abhayadeva's commentaries on this and on the Upāsaha-daiāḥ, since later Svetāmbaras appear to attach little importance to this formulation of the layman's duty. Even Hemacandra seems to have omitted it from the section of the Yoga-daixta devoted to the irāca-hāzāra, and the belated description of the pratimās furnished apparently for the sake of completeness by Yasovijaya in the seventeenth century is no more than perfunctory.

1. THE STAGE OF RIGHT VIEWS (darsana-pratima)

The Pratimā-pañcāśaka¹ begins by explaining the word pratimā as meaning 'body' (Prakrit bondh), that body which is the vehicle of the human incarnation and which in the drainae-patimā is purified from misconceptions(hu-graha) through the elimination of mithyātva which is compared to a poison infecting the system. The characteristic of this stage is the avoidance of the atteāras of sampakrica.

The Digambaras from Samantabhadra* onwards add to this a second requirement the observance of the mula-gunas. (Kärttikeya, of course, as was noted above, makes these into two separate pratimas) Samantabhadra* further stipulates for this stage a lack of attachment to creature comforts and worldly life, and devotion to Jina and gurus. Amtagati* speaks of fostering the gunas of samyaktva, Vasunandin* stresses particularly the eschewing of the seven vyusunas, and Äsädhara* insists in more general terms on purity of moral conduct; whilst the Śrāvaka-dharma-dohaka' characterizes the first pratimā very simply as 'refraining from eating the udumbara fruits'.

2. The stage of taking the vows (vrata-pratimā)

This in the Pañcātaka² is described as the assumption and observance of the watas and the avoidance of their aticāras and the comprehension that the essence of the law is compassion. Abhayadeva makes it plain that here the ani-vratas are intended.

Samantabladra, however, states unambiguously that this pratimā implies also the observance of the guna-cratas and išisāvratas, and from the statements of other ācāryar this may be taken as the generally accepted Digambara view. Freedom from the three śa/ya, is, of course, a prerequiste for the taking of the vows.

3. The stage of practising the sāmāyika (sāmāyika-pratīmā)

When his observance of the anu-ratas is satisfactory the aspirant to spiritual progress is fit to perform the sāmāyika, which, as the commentators never tire of repeating, temporarily assimilates him to the status of an ascetic. The frequency with which this is to be carried out is not clearly defined. Abhayadevat considers the morning and evening twilight periods as the proper times.

Where the Svetāmbaras see in the sāmāyika a purification of the word of the same Digambaras like Samantabhadras repard it as an act of worship of the Jina comprising the gestures of reverence associated with the vandanaka, and performed thrice daily Others such as Somadeva seem to extend the concept to cover the full ritual of the cartya-vandana.

4. THE STAGE OF FASTING (posadha-pratimā)

This involves the keeping of four fasts in each month. The differences in observance are noted under the head of the poṣa-dhopavāsa-vrata.

5 THE STAGE OF CONTINENCE BY DAY (kāyotsarga-pratimā, rātri-bhakta-pratimā)

According to Abhayadeva<sup>7</sup> the requirements of this pratimā are that on the parvan days when fasting a man should spend the whole night in the kāyotsarga posture, steadfast in heart and conscious of his aim, and that at other times he should avoid sexual congress by day and 'make only moderate use' of his wife by night. He should also, in the words of the Pañcāśaka, be vikata-bhojin (explained as 'refraining from night eating').

Amongst the Digambaras Karttikeya and Samantabhadra (followed by Rajamalla) interpret this pratima to mean the refusal to take food by night. The existence of this view is noted by Asadhara3 but he, with Camundaraya, 4 Somadeva, Amitagati, and Vasunandin (and also Medhavin and Vamadeva), prefers to understand by it the abstinence from sexual relations during the day. Aśadharas indeed would seem to extend this interdiction at this stage to cover all intercourse unless during the rtu and expressly for the procreation of children.

6. THE STAGE OF ABSOLUTE CONTINENCE (abrahmavariana-bratimā)

In this pratima according to the Pañcasaka the layman is to avoid not only all physical contact with a woman, but he is never to. allow himself to be alone with a woman, nor to engage in conversation about women, and he must also avoid any care for his personal appearance or for the clothes and ornaments he wears,

The Digambaras? take the opportunity here to stress the value of meditation on the impurity of the human body (the literature is very rich iii verses on this theme) and the inborn wickedness of women, as an aid to carrying out this matima, in which of course are also comprised the cessation of all sexual activity and the extinction of all desire

7. THE STAGE OF PURISY OF NOURISHMENT (sacittatyāga-pratīmā)

The Pañcāśaka8 explains that from among the fourfold aliments the layman must now avoid in the asana category, inter alia, tandula, umbikā, chick-peas (canaka), and sesamum (tila), in the pana category all unboiled water as well as liquids that contain salt; in the khādīma category the five udumbara fruits and cirbhatika;10 and in the svadima category myrobalans (haritaki), betel, and the use of a

- 1 KA 382-3 2 RK v. 21 3 SDhA va. 13 4 CS, p. 19 5 SDhA vii 14. 6 P (SrUP) 20-21.
- 7 eg RK v 22 8 P (SrUP) 23-25.
- The lexicographers explain this to mean 'fried stalks of wheat or barley'. 10 Cucumis utilissimus toothpick. As Abhayadeva points out he would also have to refrain from eating any grains or pulses, uncooked or insufficiently cooked, and any of the foodstuffs that are styled tucchauşadhis.

The Digambaras<sup>1</sup>, who nearly all make this pratimathe fifth on the list, exclude here the consumption of all roots and tubers, green leaves and shoots, and seeds and fruits in an uncooked state. Ašādhara<sup>2</sup> comments that the man who would hestate to crush a growing plant with his foot should not be ready to pick and eat that same plant. By this pratima the layman in fact engages himself to observe the same food restrictions as are incumbent on a monk.

 The stage of abandonment of activity (ārambhatyāga-pratimā)

In this stage the layman must relinquish all harmful activity done by himself, but is not yet strongwilled enough to abandon all activity exercised indirectly through agents or servants for the sake of a livelihood.<sup>3</sup>

The Digambaras state that in order to avoid himsā all activity exercised for a livelihood—commerce equally with agriculture—is to be abandoned, but from this prohibition the ārambha inherent in such religious practices as pāṇā is expressly excluded.<sup>4</sup>

9. The stage of breaking the ties with the house-HOLD LIFE (Svetämbara presya-tyāga-pratimā, Digambara parıgraha-tyāga-pratimā and anumati-tyāga-pratimā)

The description of the ninth stage in the Pañcādaka is fair warrant for asserting that it corresponds both to the 'abandonment of acquisitiveness' and the 'abandonment of approval for the household life' which figure in the Digambara enumeration. In the pratimā when he ceases to have work done by servants the layman is to lay down the burden of worldly cares on his sons or brothers or on other members of his household (this would in effect correspond to what the Digambaras call sakala-datti), to reduce to the minimum his acquisitive hankerings (mamatva) and to foster the longing for final release (tamnega).

For the Digambaras parigraha-tyāga is the abandonment of the ten external attachments since in Cāmundarāya's words parigraha is the begetter of the four kasāyas, of ārta- and raudra-dhyāna, and

```
1 e g. RK v. 20. 2 SDhA vii. 9. 3 P (ŚrUP) 26.
4 SDhA vii. 21. 5 P (ŚrUP) 29-31. 6 CS, p. 19.
```

of fear, Aśadhara<sup>1</sup> takes up the question of sakala-dattı and prescribes the formalities for its accomplishment they are, he says. required to prevent the resurrection of the tiger of delusion. Samantabhadra2 notes that anumati-tyaga is expressed in three ways: the refusal to approve attachment to possessions (parigraha), harmful activities (arambha), or the affairs of this world (arhikakarman). At this stage says Asadhara the layman should spend his time in the temple carrying out svadhyaya and after the midday vandana should take his meal, when summoned, in his own or in somebody else's house, reflecting that soon he will no longer be eating specially prepared food but only what is given as alms. This stage is essentially one of preparation for the eleventh pratimā when the world is renounced Vasunandin's comments that the only parigraha permissible from the ninth stage onwards is attachment to clothes, this being gradually reduced in the succeeding pratimas. In this stage the layman is to refuse to express any opinion on household affairs even when it is sought by those dearest to him.

10 and 11. THE STAGE OF RENUNCIATION OF THE WORLD (uddista-tvāga-pratimā and śramana-bhūta-pratimā)

In the uddista-tvāga-pratimās the layman, according to the Pañcājaka, avoids all food specially prepared for him and goes about with shaven pate or wearing a top-knot, indifferent to mundane business. In the sramana-bhūta6 stage he is either to keep his head shaven or to perform the loca-the tearing out of the hair, traditionally in five handfuls, supposedly obligatory on every monk on ordination-and to carry the monastic requisites-the broom (rajo-harana) and the begging-bowl (avagraha). He is then said to be touching or supporting the dharma with his body. Even if on his almsround he goes to his own kith and kin he may only beg his food and eat only what is licit for a sadhu.

The earlier Digambaras know only one form of the eleventh pratimā. Kundakunda7 lays down that the layman is to make the begging round practising irvā-samiti. Samantabhadra8 says that he is to repair to a sylvan retreat of ascetics (muni-vana) and to assume the vratas, he will then live by alms begged, wearing but one piece of cloth and pursuing asceticism. Camundaravao agrees that he is

```
SDhA vn 27-28.
4 Sr(V) 200.
```

<sup>2</sup> RK v 25 5 P (SrUP) 32-33. 7 Sútra-prübhrta, 21 8 RK v 26

<sup>3</sup> SDhA vu. 31-33. 6 P (SrUP) 35-37. 9 CS, p 19.

to live by alms and to wear only one piece of cloth and adds that he is to eat from the hollow of his hand and to reject food or any other form of dāna that has been specially reserved for him,

The first text to mention two divisions of the eleventh pratima seems to be the Śrāvaka-dharma-dohaka; in the former, one piece of cloth is worn, in the second, only a loincloth (kaupina), the hair of the head being removed either by tonsure or by the loca. It is not. however, until the sixteenth century that the names by which these two types of laymen are still known are applied to them for the first time. Rajamalla, in the Lati-samhita,2 calls the former ksullaka and the latter ailaka. The word ksullaka is used as a Jaina technical term from an early date and undoubtedly the sense to be ascribed to it is that later attested in the Acara-dinakara3 where the ksullakatva-vidhi-of which ample details are given-appears as a sort of provisional ordination which does not bind the ordinand to the monastic life if he has not the vocation (tatah samvamasya vathokta-pālane pravrajvā, viata-bhange punar garhasthvam). The meaning is not peculiar to the Svetambaras for it is clearly thus that Camundaravas uses the term ksullaka-rūbena in describing the avalamba-brahmacarm, whilst he applies to what is today called the kvullaka the designation naisthika-brahmacarin, a layman pledged to chastity, shaven save for a top-knot, and wearing only a loincloth, in the provision that it is to be either white or red lies perhaps a hint of the subsequent distinction of ksullaka and ailaka,5 for according to Medhavino the former wears white and the latter is clad in red. Medhavin though he distinguishes two types of the eleventh pratima still uses the word ksullaka in the older sense.7

Doha 17 2 Lāţi-saṃhita, vii. 55-56.

Lāţi-saṃhita, vii. 55-56.

Lāţi-saṃhita, vii. 55-56.

Hiralal Jain, in his introduction to the Vasimonds-throughtedera, has discussed at length the meaning and origin of the terms shulles and aidaba. Baing himself on the views expressed in the Adv-parhous and on the use of the word kpullabain was work the Parhyuistent-aidaba to which he perhaps searches too early a date, he work the Parhyuistent-aidaba to which he perhaps searches too early a date, he leighble to become a monk owing to lowly borth. This argument can with difficulty be sustained, for in the tenth century Katha-kao of Harsens, in the tule of Yalodhaw, the young prince and princes who are Jains devotees appear as kyalidakar in the time of an dozing-but In regard to the suggested derivation of aidaba from aerlaba it can only be pour out that—leaving saide the philoboratory of the parhous property of the parhous descriptions of the parhous descriptions of the parhous descriptions.

<sup>6</sup> Dharmā-samgraha-śrāvakācāra, vin.

From Vasunandin' and Āšādhara' onwards the Digambara authorities all describe the two varieties of the uddisfa-tyāga-pratīmā and the general delineation remains the same. The kṣullaka is to wear one piece of cloth (Āšādhara speaks of a white loincloth), to cut off his harr and beard either with scissors or with a razor, to take food seated, either from a bowl or from the hollow of his hand, and to perform pratitekhana with a soft piece of tissue. The alaka may wear no more than a loincloth, must make the loca and eat from the palm of his hand, and will carry a peacock's feather raio-harana to make pratitekhana.

Both ksullaka and ailaka are enjoined to observe rigidly the complete posadhopavāsa on the parvan days, and both must bee their food according to the following routine. The quasi-ascetic when he goes, begging-bowl in hand, to a layman's house is either to show himself and wait silently or to pronounce the dharmalabha (the benediction used by a monk in greeting to a layman), and if he receives no alms he must not be dispirited but is to repeat the request elsewhere. When he has obtained enough food to satisfy the craving of hunger he should eat no more. He may drink only water that has been rendered sterile by boiling (prāsuka). Then having washed his almsbowl he should go back to his guru to make pratyākhyāna followed by ālocanā or confession of his faults.3 But the ksullaka or aslaka may, if he chooses, make a yow or nivama to beg only from one house (eka-bhiksā-nivama); in that event he is to follow a monk on his begging round and if he meets with a refusal must of necessity fast. Again he may prefer to stay all the time in a mum-vana engaging in tapas and performing the ten kinds of varyāvrttva for the ascetics.5

Certain features of the monk's life remain forbidden to the laymac ween in the eleventh pratima. He is not allowed to study the mysteries of the sacred texts. It may not engage in the kāyotsarga for a whole day (dina-pratimā), nor pursue the almstound (viracarya) as does a monk, nor practise the tri-kālā-yoga, the form of asceticism which consists in meditating on a hill-top in the hot season, under a tree during the rains, and by a river's bank in winter. Pride in one's own knowledge or asceticism is severely to be condemned and the form of greeting used by the laity icchā-kāra remains the only one which ksullaka and ailaka may properly use.

 $<sup>^{1}</sup>$  Sr (V) 301-13  $^{2}$  SDhA vii. 34-50.  $^{2}$  SDhA vii. 34-50. Its curious to find the term dharma-lābha used in a Digamts text

<sup>4</sup> SDhA vii 46.

The conception of the pratimas seems to have suffered certain modifications in the history of Jainism. As delineated in the Upāsaka-dašāh they are a means to achieve a spiritual development which will in the end lead the devotee to take his own life by sallekhanā. It is therefore natural to expect that in course of time if fewer Svetämbara laymen tend to have recourse to ritual spicide the pratimas lose their significance. Where among the Digambaras sallekhanā remains at least in an attenuated form ('in the event of mortal illness or famine or calamity')2 part of the pattern of life, for the ordinary layman great importance continues to attach to the pratimās. By placing them in the sallekhanādhikara of his śrāvakācāra Samantabhadra clearly emphasizes the connexion whilst Āśādhara expressly states that the ksullaka and aılaka should always keep in mind the possibility of recourse to sallekhana, or put in other terms, the nasthika-śrāvaka has still to become a sādhaka-śrāvaka.3 In fact, for various reasons in the Digambara community-some have suggested that the conquest of large areas of India by Moslems who disapproved of nudity was responsible--laymen in the eleventh bratima came, to a large extent, to take the place of monks. Perhaps because of the importance of these quasi-monks the sequence that led, through the pratimas, automatically to sallekhanā was broken.

There is, as certain Digambara ācāryas imply, a special connexion between the pratmās and the iskṣā-vratas: the third and fourth pratmās are at the same time iskṣā-vratas and the fifth, sixth, and seventh all relate to the parishogopabhoga-vrata, food being the main parishoga and women the principal upabhoga; and even the last three pratmās are concerned, inter alia, with the progressive diminution of attachment to another upabhoga—clothing. Classifications of irāvakas according to their progress through the pratmās are offered by some Digambaras such as Somadeva and Āšādhara.

THE DINA-CARYA

AFTER outlining the traditional pattern of the layman's duties as expressed in the virtual, Hermacandra lays down that if he fulfils these and also practises charity reverently to the seven ketrus and compassionately to the needy he is to be designated amahā-trīvukal, a term, not it would seem, previously employed but adopted later by Aśadhara and by some Svetimbaras. This ideal layman is expected to carry out the obligations of his religion in a uniform round which Hermacandra calls the dina-caryār and which serves as a framework for a description of the pūjā and cartya-vandana and the various vanjakas.

If the expression is Hemacandra's the idea is very much older. As early as the Straehab-rapidipit the exposition of the tratas is followed by a rather rough-and-ready description of the abit-grahas. This word, which in normal usage is the equivalent of myama (a vow), appears already in this text, specialized in the meaning of any duty incumbent on a layman, it may include even such obligations as the provision of ghee for monks who have just performed the loca. It reappears in this sense in such later works as the Srāddha-dima-kryta of

In the Śrāwaka-dhamia-pañcāiakas the picture of the dma-carvā is already taking shape. The pious Jama is to iecte the paāca-namaskāra on waking and to say to himself 'I am a śrāwaka and have taken the vows' Before starting his work he goes to the temple and performs the pāġā and cairya-candana When he returns home he eats at the fitting time and again repairs to the temple to listen to the scriptures, perform pāġā, and wait on the ascetics. At might he will go to sleep, as he woke, with the namaskāra.

The sitras of the Dharma-bindu<sup>6</sup> offer a concise notation of all the daily duties, and on this description Hemacandra<sup>7</sup> has drawn largely. The stracka is to get up at the brahma-muhita (the fourteenth of the night) with the namaskira on his lips and recalling his vows. A long description of the cartya-vandama follows and then of the pratheraman and pratyākhyāma. After the morning's work the layman is to make the midday pūjā before taking his meal.

<sup>1</sup> YS 111. 120 4 SrDK 269 7 YS 111. 122-32

&lt;sup>2</sup> YŚ III 122 (p. 597). <sup>5</sup> P (ŚrDh) 42-46

SrPr 376.
 DhB m 46 ff.

The afternoon he spends in questioning the monks about the scriptures after which he performs the evening pājā and the axalyakas. He will now, if he is in the habit of eating twice a day, take his second meal. When he lies down to sleep he is to pursue his meditations on the scriptures, avoiding if he can all sexual relations and indeed all erotic ideas.

In the sixth adhyāya of the Sāgāra-dharmāmirta Ašādhara¹ took over Hemacandra¹s picture of the dina-caryā beginning with the moment of waking when the irāvaka asks himself: Who am 1? What are my vows? What is my dharma?' but he did not find imitators among the later Digambaras, and there is only a faint echo of Hemacandra in Medhāvni s² use of the expression mahā-irāvaha.

The real importance of the dna-carya lies in its adoption as the preferred model for the later isrāvakācāras. The most important, and one of the first works constructed on these lines, is the Srādaha-dina-kriya of Devendra. In general terms the abhigrahas which he prescribes for laymen may be set out as follows.<sup>3</sup>

The śrāvaka awakens with the namaskāra and as the torpor of sleep falls away calls to mind the religion to which he belongs, the family into which he has been born and the yows which he has assumed. When after defecation, tooth-cleaning, tongue-scraping, mouth-ringing, and bathing he is in a state of cleanliness, of ritual purity, he is to make dravva-pūjā and bhāva-pūjā to the lina image in the chapel of his own home and to undertake the form of pratyakhyāna appropriate to the time of day. Before engaging in this act of worship he should if possible perform the six avasvakas. The adoration of the Jina is then repeated in the form of pūjā and caityavandana in the temple. The devotee then seeks out the religious teachers and, repeating the pratyakhyana before them, listens to their exposition of the scriptures. He is enjoined to inquire formally after their well-being and to perform for them various personal services, including the provision of medicaments for the sick, His work must then claim his undivided attention.

When he returns from his place of business he is to carry out the noon phijā and, after providing alms for any monks who may require to be fed, he is to take his midday meal, eating in moderation. He will then reaffirm the pratyakhyūna and meditate on the meaning of the scriptures. At the close of the afternoon he performs the evening pūjā and the six āvašyakas. He is then to engage in svādhyāya and if necessary to minister to the bodily needs of the ascetics (vaix-viśrāmanā) by massaring their limbs and in other ways.

&lt;sup>2</sup> SDhA vi. 1-9.
<sup>3</sup> SrDK 2-7, these opening verses summarize the dina-caryā.

Finally he will go home and, after giving religious instruction to his household, he down to sleep, sleep, like food, is to be indulged in with moderation. If possible he should abstain from sexual intercourse and to this end he should, during the intervals of sleep direct his mind to meditation on the impurity of the human body and the innate wickedness of women and to emulation of those who have reconnect the work.

THE NECESSARY DUTIES

THE SIX daily avalyakas or necessary duties are traditionally.

- (1) sāmāyika—this is the subject also of a vrata and of a pratimā,
- (2) caturomiati-stava—praise of the twenty-four Jinas (this is comprised in the caitya-vandana),
- (3) vandanaka—worship (generally restricted to the ritual expression of respect to a monk or to the community of monks),
- (4) pratikramana—the recitation of the formulae of confession of past faults,
- (5) pratyākhyāna—the recitation of formulae for the forfending of future faults generally expressed in the form of abstinence from food and drink and comforts,
- (6) kāyotsarga—'the abandonment of the body' for a limited time.

The numbering of the āvaiyakas is that of the Svetāmbaras; the Digambaras reverse the positions of kāyotsarga and pratyākhyāna.

This list was perhaps never wholly satisfactory. In particular the hapytarga is different in its nature from the other wayswas to which it is properly an adjunct; keeping the body motionless for a limited period of time serves as an aid to concentration of mind but is not an end in itself. To judge from the details of the mediaeval texts the Svetämbaras would probably have regarded the most important wayswas as phija, cau'ya-cundana, and guru-cundana and even the notion of 'daily' duties must have tended to be lost, if the fifteenth-century Ratnasekhara,1 who includes the sāmāyika and the caitya-vandana among the religious practices recommended specifically for the enforced leisure of the rainy season, is to be regarded as reflecting the practice of his age.

<sup>1</sup> See Schubring, Die Lehre der Jamas, p. 170.

The Digambaras seem tacitly to accept that the avasyakas are rather a matter for the ascetic than for the layman and writers like Cāmundarāya2 and Āśādhara, who treat both of śrāvākācāra and yaty-ācāra refer, their readers to the latter for information about these rites. Those acarvas who follow the tradition of linasena have virtually replaced the avasyakas by a list of six daily karmans to be performed by the layman 13

- (1) pūjā-which in fact covers the sāmāvika, caturvimšati-stava, and vandanaka;
- (2) vārttā—the exercise of an honest livelihood:
- (3) dana—almsgiving, this is the subject also of a vrata;
  - (4) svādhyāva study of the scriptures;
- (5) samvama—the carrying out of the five anuvratas with complete self-discipline:
- (6) tapas-which includes pratikramana, pratyākhyāna, and kāvotsarga.

THE NAMASKĀRA

THE basic ritual formula of Jamism is the pañca-namaskāra or pañca-paramesthi-stuti,4 the invocation which runs:

namo arthantānam namo siddhānam namo āvārīvānam namo uvajihāvānam namo loe savva-sāhūnam to which is sometimes added the complementary verse:

eso pañca-namokkāro savva-pāva-ppanāsano mangalanam ca savvesım padhamam havaı mangalam

Hail to the linas, to those who have attained moksa, to religious leaders, to religious teachers and to all monks in the world. This fivefold salutation which destroys all sin is pre-eminent as the most auspicious of all auspicious things.

Srāddha-vidhs, p. 158a.

<sup>2</sup> Thus CS, p. 26 vandanā . . tat-prapañcas túttaratra vaksyate. This reference is taken up on p. 69 of the section anagăra-dharme tapo-varnanam where details of the vandana are given.

<sup>4</sup> See Glasenapp, op. cit, p. 367. 3 MP xxxviii. 24, CS, p. 21. C 737

This supreme prayer, this best object of meditation serves as a quarry for magic formulae of varying lengths and different potency: thirty-five syllables—or sixty-eight if the complementary verse is added—are counted in the full namaskira (sarvakksiramatra) but various abbrevations, of which the most popular is the use of the initial aksaras of the five paramethins (mukhyāksiramatra), are employed to give totals of sixteen, six, five, and two aksaras: The whole namaskira can also be concentrated in the single syllable om which is held to be a contraction of the mukhyāksirama-matra, suddha being replaced by siarira and sadhu by munit to give a, a, ā, u, m. Audibly muttered in an unending repetition, these formulae play an important part in the padae-sha-dhyāna. This practice of japa (as it is called) is accompanied by the telling of the beads, which may be of sold or prems or merely of folius seeds.

The rectation of the paica-namakāra, the apaājita-manta as it as styled, comes to be synonymous with acceptance of the Jaina creed and it is with this prayer on his lips that the pious layman should wake each morning? Twice a day at the morning and evening twilights he is to meditate on the excellent protection derived from it. Its magic powers grow in the popular imagination as witness the late Katina-mālā which says that whos creembers this imperishable mantra will never be seized by rāksasas or bitten by cobras. 8

With the namaskāra is associated the catuh-sarana, the recourse to the four refuges of the arhats, the addhas, the âcāryas, and the community, and both are mentioned particularly as a source of support in the final trial of the salkehana? when they form the symbolic quintessence of the scriptures, which are too long to be borne in mind in that hour. The catuh-sarana runs as follows:

arahante saranam pavvajjāmi, siddhe saranum pavvajjāmi, sāhū saranam pavvajjāmi, kevali-pannattam dhammam pavvajjāmi

The use of mantras as a feature of worship develops more and more, under the influence of Hinduism. The biggest impetus to this trend seems to have come from Jinasena, who prescribed their use with all hrivas 8

```
      1 SrDK 1c
      2 Sr (V), p. 466
      3 Handiqui, p. 272.

      4 SrDK 2
      5 Dharma-rasāyama, 152
      6 Ratna-mālā, 43.

      2 Y Ś in 151 (p. 758)
      8 MP xxxviii 75.
```

THE CAITYA-VANDANA

THE caitva-vandana, which comprises elements of the samavika. caturvimsati-stava, and vandanaka, the first three necessary duties. is given an extensive treatment in the Avasyaka literature. Understood as the 'veneration of the lina's image', it is closely associated with the pūjā 'the making of offerings to the Iina', and Devendra defines it as the combination of the dravya-pūjā (actual offerings) and bhava-buia (hymns of praise and mental concentration). Hemacandra, it must be admitted, describes the pūjā only as an element of the caitya-vandana, but in the much earlier Prakrit Pañcāsakas the two topics are kept separate in different sections. It would seem more appropriate to follow the Pañcāśakas in restricting the term castya-vandana to the bhāva-pūjā and to what in effect constitutes the Jama liturgy, and to apply the designation pūjā to the bathing and adorning of the images and the making of offerings to them, both in the temple and in the home. The following consideration of the cartva-vandana is virtually limited to Svetambara sources. since, at least during the medieval period, the Digambara treatises on the lay life barely touch on the subject.

From the Āvaśyaka texts onwards the ācāryas divide the castyavandana into twelve sections devoted to specific objects of worship (adhikāra) and five chants (dandaka):

(	manuj and nive chance	(uniquarus).
	ADHIKĀRA	DAŅDAKA	Appropriate passage of liturgy
(1)	Bhāva-jina	Pranipāta	Śakra-stava without final verse
(2)	Dravya-jina		final verse of Sakra-stava
(3)	Eka-caitya-sthāpanā-jina	Arhac-cartya- stava	castya-stava
(4)	Nama-jina	Nama-jina-stava	nāma-stava¹
(5)	Tri-bhuvana-sthāpanā- una		cantya-stava preluded by the words savva-loe
(6)	Virahamāna-jina	Śruta-stava	first verse of śruta-stava
(7)	Śruta-jñāna		rest of śruta-stava
(8)	Sarva-siddha-stuti	Siddha-stava	first verse of siddha-stava
(9)	Tırthădhipa-vîra-stutı	,,	second and third verses of siddha-stava
(10)	Ujjayanta-stuti	17	fourth verse of siddha-stava
(11)	Aşţăpada-stutı	,,	fifth verse of siddha-stava
(12)	Sudreti-smarana		sura-smṛti-sūtra

This is the caturenniats-stava For a translation and discussion see Leumann, Übersicht über die Ävafyaka-Literatur, pp 6-7.

Each adhikāra concerns a special object of worship:

- Bhāva-jina—this implies the visualization of the Jinas endowed with kevala-jñāna as they are present in the sama-vasarana.
- Dravya-jina—this is the worship of the arhatva-dravya, the raw material of the quality of Jina, i.e. the jina-jivas who will one day in this or in another life attain to final release.
- Eka-catya-sthāpanā-jina—the worship of Jina images in temples everywhere.
- 4 Nāma-jina—worship of the names of the twenty-four Jinas who have appeared in the present era in Bharata-ksetra. This corresponds to the second āvasyaka, the catureimsatitiana, in its parrower sense.
- Trı-bhuvana-sthāpanā-jına—the worship of Jina images in šāśvata and aśāśvata temples in the three worlds
- 6. Virahamāna-jina-worship of the infinite number of absent linas, past and future, in the universe
- 7. Śruta-jñāna-worship of the holy writ.
- Sarea-siddha-stuti—worship of all those beings who have attained to moksa
- 7 Tirthādhpa-Vī a-stuti—worship of Mahāvīra the last Jina.
   Uijayanta-stuti—worship of the twenty-second Jina Arista-
- nemi, who entered into nirvāna on Mount Ujjayanta.
- Aṣṭāpada-stuti—worship of the other twenty-two Jinas, who entered into nirvāna on Mount Astāpada
- Sudṛṣta-ṣmaraṇa—worship of those devas who like the Gomukha Yakṣas attained to samyaktva and performed vaiyārrttya to Mahāvira.

Haribhadra recognizes only time adinkāras, the second, tenth, and eleventh being omitted, but the dandakas and the pattern of the ritual of course remain the same. In fact the ritual as set forth in the Vandana-valdāna-paticālaka, in such Āvalyuka commentaries as the Lalita-valraā of Haribhadra and the Castya-vandana-bhārya of Devendra, and in Hemacandra's Yoga-äästra' shows almost no variation. It is given a numerical framework by division into five preparatory features (abhagama) and ten triads (trikā) or groups of three related actions, or of actions requiring to be performed three times:

THE FIVE ABHIGAMAS! (which are extracted from the conventional descriptions of the ruler or rich man arriving to perform the sāmāyika) are:

- Discarding of all sentient (sacitta) objects such as flowers, betel, siddhārthaka, durva grass, that may be on one's person.
- Retaining of certain non-sentient (actta) objects. There is some uncertainty on this point but in any event vehicles, footwear, swords, knives, camaras, and chattras are to be left behind on entering the temple, whilst it would appear that all ornaments exceed tuderly are to be retained.
- Donning of an outer garment in the form of a wide piece of cloth.<sup>2</sup>
- Making the anjah at sight of the Jina image with the words 'Hail to the friend of the world' (name bhuvana-bandhave).
- 5. Concentrating one's mind on worship,

THE TEN TRIADS (trika):3

1. Three naisedhikis:

- The first naisedhiki<sup>4</sup> signifies the relinquishment or prohibition (miedha) of the mundane activities (grhavyāpāra). It is to be pronounced on entering the main gate of the temple.
- (11) The second naişedhiki implies the abandonment of all activities connected with the temple (Jina-grha-vyāpāra) and is spoken when one enters the inner sanctuary (gabha-grha).
- (iii) The third narsednuki expresses the end of activities (Jina-pijā-vyāpāra) connected with the pijā ceremony (which must of necessity involve some harmful ārambha). It is pronounced before carrying out the actual cartya-vandana.
- 1 CVBh 19-20
- <sup>2</sup> The commenturies make it clear that a man is therefore expected to wear two pieces of cloth and a woman three, of which one will be the kuñcuka or bodice.
- <sup>3</sup> The clearest description of these is to be found in the Sanghāiāra commentary of Dharmaghosa CVBh 6-19
- "The symbolism of the naugalhiki, as interpreted in the Volkstymologie, is lot if the correct sanktritation of natilitys as restored. For a discussion of the subject see Leumann, op, cit, pp. 9-10 (who explains). "Man hat write the Acanity'd me leut Fernheicheulem and unter de Nathysie ance leut Engistisma zu verstehen. Ebeno soll mon be jeder Ankunft mit dem Wort niitheyd eine genuise Weile verbreiten.

- 2. Three circumambulations (pradaksmā).
- 2. Three reverences (pranama).1
  - - (i) The añjali.
    - (ii) The pañcanga, i.e. a reverence in which the five limbs -head, two hands, and two knees-all touch the ground.
  - (iii) The ardhavanata, i.e. a reverence in which the body is 'half-bent', the head and hands touching the ground.

These are each to be made three times and to be accompanied by the words 'Hail to the Jinas' ( Jinebhyo namah).

- 4. Three forms of pūjā:
  - (1) anga-pūjā;
  - (ii) agra-pūjā;
  - (111) bhāva-būjā

These are discussed at length in the section on pujā. it is only the third-the immaterial acts of worship in the form of stuti-that belongs to the cartya-vandana in its narrower sense, embracing the twelve adhrkāras and five dandakas listed above.

- Meditation (dhyāna) on the three states (avasthā) of the Jina
  - (1) on the chadma-stha state in which he is still travestied as an ordinary mortal. To this the pinda-stha-dhyana applies. It is again divided into three phases:
    - (a) birth—the meditation is stimulated by the images of the snapakas, the gods mounted on elephants, who pour water from ewers (kalaśa),
    - (b) kingship-the meditation is stimulated by the images of the arcakas, the votaries who bring garlands;
    - (c) the monkish condition—the meditation is provoked by the sight of the Jina's hairless head:
  - (11) on the kawalya state in which he has attained infinite knowledge. To this belongs the pada-stha-dhyāna, which arises from the vision of the eight prātihāryas,2 the miraculous manifestations which took place when the Jina attained to kevala-iñāna:

The Digambara Amitagati lists five kinds of pranāma (Śr (A) vin. 62-64). For the prattharyas see Glasenapp, op cit, p 253.

(iii) on the siddhatva state in which he has reached nirvāṇa. Here the meditation, the rūpātita-dhyāna, is to be achieved by performing the kāyotsarga in the parya-ikāsana posture.

(The rūpa-stha-dhyāna,1 which arises from the mere sight of the image, is expressly excluded from this trika.)

- 6. Abstention from looking in the three directions (tr.-din-mri-kṣaṇa-wirati). The worshipper is not to look to the right or to the left or behind hum (in another interpretation neither upwards nor downwards nor transversally) but is to keep his gaze fixed on the image.
  - 7 Making pramārjana three times of the ground under foot (pada-bhūmi-pramārjana).
- 8. Fulfilling the three requirements of the liturgy (varnādi-trika):
  - reciting distinctly and without omissions or additions the words of the stutis;
  - (ii) reflecting on their meaning;
  - (iii) representing to oneself mentally the objects of adoration.
- q. The three mudrās '2
  - Jina-mudrā—the two hands hang down loosely and the feet do not touch. The purpose of this mudrā is to remove obstacles.
  - (ii) yoga-mudrā—the two hands are joined with the fingers interlocking and the elbows resting on the abdomen. The mudrā is calculated to achieve all desires.
  - (iii) muktā-iuktt-mudrā—the two hands are clasped evenly together and raised so as to touch the middle of the forehead. (A divergent view holds that they should be close to the eves without actually touching the forehead.)
- 10. The threefold final prayer (pranidhāna),<sup>2</sup> the concentration of mind, body, and speech in the form of caitya-vandana, guru-vandana, and prārthanā (invocation).

! The four types of dhyāna are described by Amitagati (Śr (A) xv 30-56)
2 Amitagati describes in addition to these three a vandana-mudrā (Śr (A) viii. 52-65) and many other mudrā are found in the rival literature

The term pranidhāna seems to be used approximately in this sense in the Srāvaka-prajnapti (368-73).

(1) the first pranudhāna, called from its opening words the jāvanti-ceiyāim jävanti ceiyäim uddhe ya ahe ya tırıya-loe ya savväim täim vande iha santo tattha santäim

From here I adore all such images as exist there in the upper world and the middle world and the nether world;

 (ii) the second pranidhāna, called the jāvanta-kei-sāhū jāvanta kei sāhū Bharah'-Eravaya-Mahāvidehe ya savvesim tesum panao tsvihena ti-danda-virayānam

I bow down to all those sādhus averse from evil in word, in thought, or in act who are to be found in Bharata, Airāvata, and Mahāvideha;

(iii) the third pranidhāna, called the jāya-viyarāya or pranidhāna-sūtra

The text of this is given below in its place at the end of the liturgy.

The numerical plan of the cattya-vandana includes in addition to the five abhigamas and ten trikas a mention of three avagi ahas (ukhrita, madhyama, and jaghanya), the distance from the image at which the votary is to stand—the best avagraha is sax hastas away—and of the vāma—dik and akhram—dik Men, it is said, are to stand on the right of the image when worshipping, because of their pre-eminence in the dhama, and women on the left

From the elaborate details the sequence of the elements of the vandana would seem, at least in Devendra's picture, to be as follows

On arriving at the temple and catching sight of the image above the door, the worshipper makes the añjali. As he enters, and leaves behind the cares of the world, he utters the first naisedniki. He goes into the sanctuary and, as he circumanbulates the images, he pronounces the second naisedniki He then carries out the phil for which he has brought with him the necessary materials, first bathing and dressing the image, and then setting the offerings before it, and burning meense and waving lamps. When this is done he utters the third naisedniki, makes the pañaling-pranama, and, adopting the joga-mudrā, commences the recitation of the Saleta-stava, replacing it by the fina-mudrā for the catiyu-stava. When the five dandakas are completed he recites the three pranishmas accompanying them by the muktā-sakti-mudrā. The catiya-vandana is then at an end

The castya-vandana liturgy in its narrower sense may be outlined as follows:

The worshipper recites the pañæ-namakëra, performs pratitramana and ālocānā using the airyāpathiki-nūtra,¹ and then engages in the kāyottarga reciting the uttari-karapa-sūtra¹ and kāyotsarpa-sūtra.¹ He concentrates his mind and his gaze on the Jina, and his body horriplating from the force of sameega and using the voer-mode started the tars¹ he makes the pañæŋa-prañama and using the voer-mudrā starts or recite the pañæŋa-granāma and using the voer-mudrā starts or recite the pañæŋa-granāma and

1. PRANIPĀTA-DANDAKA.5

The Sakra-stava, so-called because in the legends it is usually spoken by Indra, 6 runs as follows:

namo 'thu arhantidam bhagwantidam, digarisam tithayardnam syamambadiham, puri 'utuanisam puris-sishiam purisa-vara-gundha-hattiham, log-utuanisam purisa-vara-pundariyinam purisa-vara-gundha-hattiham, log-utuanisam log-angiaw-dayinam nama log-angiaw-dayinam sarama-dayinam boh-dayinam nagga-dayinam sarama-dayinam boh-dayinam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-siyaninam dhamma-siyaninam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-dayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam dhamma-tayinam tirayinam badhhanan bohayinam mutiham moyaginam, tunainam tirayinam badhhanan bohayinam mutiham moyaginam, tunainam tirayinam ana tayam dhamtam akkha-tayam tayabaham apunaritusti-nddh-gai-namadheyam thanam sampattis-nam nana tirama nuwa habaman nuwa-bhasam sampattis-nan nana tirama nuwa habaman nuwa-bhasama nuwa-bhasama nuwa-bhasama nuwa-bhasama nuwa-bhasaman nuwa-bh je ya aīyā sīddhā je ya bhavīssanti 'nāgae kāle sambai ya vattamānā savve tivihena vandāmi

Praise to the arhats, the blessed ones, who are the cause of the beginnings, who provide the path across, who have of themselves attained enlightenment, the best among men, the lones among men, the lones among men, the lones among men, the lones of the world, the lords of the world, the benefactors of the world, the lights of the world, the irradiators of the world, those who give freedom from fear, who give masplt, who give the right direction, who give refuge, who give enlightenment, who give the sacred doctrine, who expound the sacred doctrine, the authorities on the sacred doctrine, the occumental monarchs of the sacred doctrine, those who maintain the irrefutable knowledge and misight.

<sup>1</sup> See p 163 2 See p. 173. 2 See p. 173. 4 YS, p. 612.

&lt;sup>1</sup> YS, pp. 612-29, LV, pp. 7a-76b

<sup>2</sup> YS, pp. 612-29, LV, pp. 7a-76b

The gandha-hastin or 'perfume-elephant', a familiar creature of legend, is regarded as the noblest of beasts.

who have thrown off all travesties, the Jinas, who drive away evil, who have crossed over, who aid others across, the enlightenes, the liberated and the enlighteness, the liberated and the liberators, the omniscent, the all-seeing, those who have reached that place that is called sidalinigati from which there is no return, and which is bliss immutable, midles, mpershable, and undisturbed, praise to the Jinas who have overcome fear.

In the threefold way I worship all the siddhas, those who have been, and those who are, and those who in future time will be.

Harnbhadra and Hemacandra have felt it necessary to give a very detailed interpretation of this and the following stavas, and it is possible here to mention only a few of the points made. Special interest attaches to the popular etymologies, almost invariably false, by which the associations of a word are evoked.

Thus the arhat is explained either as the one who is worthy (ar ha) of vandana and pūnā; or (in the form of Prakrit arihanta) as the destrover of the enemies (art), these being the evil qualities such as moha which are responsible for the growth of karma, or karma itself in its various forms, or again (in the Prakrit variant aruhanta) those in whom the seed of karma can no longer grow (ruhati). The bhagavat is the possessor of bhaga defined lexically by fourteen terms which (after subtraction of the mappropriate meanings arka and voni) become the twelve ālāpakas to be recorded in the praise of the Jina: knowledge (mana), glory (mahatmya), fame (vasas), asceticism (vairāgya), final release (mukti), heauty (rūpa), courage (virya), energy (prayatna), longing (icchā), religion (dharma), abundance (śri), wealth (aiśvarya). The tirthankaras are lions because of their courage in combatting the enemy that is karma, they are lotuses because they have made to blossom in the mire of the samsāra the flower of the dharma, whilst all calamities are driven away by the presence of the tirthankara just as lesser elephants are driven away by the gandha-hastin

2. ARHAC-CAITYA-STAVA-DANDAKA2

The worshipper, making the Jina-mudrā, recites the cattya-stava: arihanla-ceiyānam karemi kāyusaggam vandana-vatityāe pūyanavatityāe sakhār-vatityāe samāmā-vatityāe bahi-lāha-vatityāe irinvasagga-vatityāe saddhāe mehāe dhie dhāraṇāe anuppehāe vaddhamāṇīe phām kāsusagata.

&lt;sup>1</sup> For these see p 229 <sup>2</sup> YS, pp 629-32, LV, pp. 76b-89b.

For the sake of the images of the arhat I make the khyotaraya, for the sake of worship, for the sake of making offernags, for the sake of making gifts, for the sake of making praue, for the sake of obtaining enlightenment, for the sake of final release, I stand in the khyotaray with faith, with intelligence, with steadfastness, with mindfulness, with reflection, with intensity.

Hemacandra understands here by pūjana the offering of flowers and garlands, by satkāra the giving of ornaments and clothes, and by samnāna hymns of praise (in other words the three forms of pūjā). These are legitimate for a layman, and an ascetic, though he may not make drawya-pūjā himself, may yet approve it or get others to nerform it.

When several worshippers are engaged in the caitya-stava together, one only will recite the words whilst the others stand silent in the käyotsarga. On completion of the käyotarga the pañca-namaskāra is to be repeated. The next phase is the praise of the twenty-four irthankara of the present era.

3. Nāma-Iina-stava-dandakai

- 1. logassa ujjoya-gare dhamma-titthayare jine
- arihante kittaissam cauvisam pi kevali 2. Usabham Ajiyam ca vande Sambhavam Abhinandanam ca Sumaim

ca
Paumappaham Supāsam unam ca Candappaham vande

- 3. Suvihim ca Pupphadantam Siyala-Sejjamsa-Vāsupujjam ca
- Vimalam Anantam ca jinam Dhammam Santim ca vandāms
  4. Kunthum Aram ca Mallim vande Munisuvvayam Nami-jinam ca vandām Ritthanemim Pāsam taha Vaddhamānam ca
- 5. evam mae abhithua vihūva-raia-māla pahīna-iara-maranā
- evam mae abhithuā vihūya-raja-māla pahīna-jara-maran cauvīsam ti ina-varā titthavarā me pasīvantu
- ktttya-vandiya-mahyyä jee logassa uttamä siddhä ärosea-bohi-läham samähi-varam uttamam dentu
- 7 candesu nımmalayarā āuccesu ahiyam payāsayarā sāgora-vara-gambhirā siddhā siddhim mama disantu

I shall prause the twenty-four Jinas, the arhats of perfect knowledge, who have illuminated the world and created the sacred doctrine as a way across ... [The names are litted]... Thus I have extolled the twenty-four Jinas who have shaken off impurities and defilements and rejected old see and death; may they, the irthshahara, be eracious to me; may they, the suddhas, the best of beings give me enlightenment and tranquility and final release, they who have been praised and worshipped and adored. May the suddhas, purer than the moons, more radiant than the suns, and profound as the oceans, give me bliss.

<sup>1</sup> YS, pp. 632-42; LV, pp. 896-966.

After this nāma-stava the cartya-stava is repeated, the words savva-loe being prefixed to it.

- 4 SRUTA-STAVA-DANDAKAI
  - Pukkhara-vara-dīv'addhe Dhāyaīkhande ya Jambudīve ya Bharah'-Etavaya-Videhe dhamm'-āigare namamsāmi
  - tama-timira-padala-viddhamsanassa sura-gana-narindu-mahiyassa sima-dharassa vande papphodiya-moha-jalassa
  - yāi-jara-marana-sogu-panāsanassa kallāna-pukkhala-visāla-suhāvahassa ko deva-dānava-narinda-gan'-accivassa dhammassa sāram uvolabbha
  - kare pamāyam 4. siddhe bho payao jina-mae nandi sayā saṃjame devam-nāga-suvanna
    - kınnar-guna-sub-shüya-bhāy-acsıe lopo yattha patthu yagam ınam telokka-macı'-asuram dhammo
    - vaddhau sāsao vyayao dhamm'-uttaram vaddhau styassa bhagavao karemi kāussageam
- I bow down to those who have established the sacred doctrine in Puskaradvīpa, in Dhātakikhanda and in Jambudvīpa, in Bharata, Airavata, and Mahāvideha.
- I worship the 'stute-'sharma, which contains the rules of conduct, which dispels the veil of the darkness of ignorance, which is adored by gods and kings, which rends assunder the net of delusion, which ends the sorrows of birth, old age, and death, which brings the full and ample blass of final release. Who, it he understands its essence, can be neglectful of the sacred doctrine worshipped by gods and demi-gods and kings? O siddhas, I am devoulty attached to the Jaina creed; well-being always the est net religious life extolled with vertrable devotion by decan, nigea, hyjotiskia, and kinmana. May the eternal sacred doctrine prosper this world of devan, mortals, and ausurs where the people are firmly established in it, may it be victorious and may it prosper the primacy of the dhuman.

The first verse is devoted to the infinite number of absent Jinas in other continents of which there is no knowledge; the rest is in praise of the holy writ.

<sup>1</sup> YS, pp 642-6, LV, pp 96b-106a

5. SIDDHA-STAVA-DANDAKAI

- siddhānam buddhānam pāra-gayānam paramparā-gayāṇam loy'-aggam woagayānam namo sayā sævva-siddhāṇam
   10 devāna vi devo iam devo pañiali namamsanti
- tam deva-deva-mahiyam sirasā vande Mahāvīram
- 3 ekko vi namokkāro jina-vara-vasahassa Vaddhamānassa
- saṃsāra-sāgarao tārei naram va nārım va A. Unenta-sela-sıhare dıkkhā nānam msīhiva ıassa
- tam dhamma-cakkavattım Arıtthanemim namamsāmı
- 5 cattāri attha dasa do ya vandiyā jina-varā cauvisam paramattha-nitthiy'-atthā siddhā siddhim mama disantu

Praise to the siddhas, the enlightened ones who have gone to the further shore, who have gone there by stages, who have reached the summit of the worlds, praise always to all siddhas.

I bow down my head to Mahāvīra, who is the god of gods, who is adored by lords of gods, and whom gods worship joining their hands. Even one namaskāra offered to the excellent Jina Vardhamāna will carry a man or a woman across the ocean of the cycle of transmigration.

I worship Aristanemi that occumenical monarch of the sacred doctrine who on the summit of the Ujiayanta mountain received the initiation and attained to kevala-iñāna and to moksa.

May the twenty-four siddhas—the twenty-two Jinas and the two others who have been celebrated—whose significance is firmly established in reality, show me final release.

These verses make up the siddhi-stava; and the dandaka is completed by an invocation of the vanyāvrttya-karas which is sometimes styled the sura-smrti-sūtra, veyävacca-garānam santı-garāṇam sammad-ditthı-samāhi-garānam karemi kāussaggam

I make the kāyotsarga for those who render service, who create tranquillity, who create absorption in right behef,

Hemacandra explains that the paramparä-gatänām of verse i refers to the progression through the guṇavthāna, the Jina is called devānām deva because he is worshipped by devas such as the Bhavana-väsis and he is also worshipped by the deva-devas such as Sakra. He is called Mahāvīra because he directs (frayat) to mokṣa. To the words nārīm va there attaches a special importance. In this connexion both Haribhadra and Hemacandra quote a passage from the lost Yāpaniya-tantra stressing that women equally with men can reach the summit of the religious life. Hemacandra says that the last two verses of the suddha-stava are not, in the opinion of some authorities, an essential part of the ritual but may be omitted.

<sup>1</sup> YS, pp. 646-53; LV, pp. 106b-118b.

When the suddha-stava-dandaka and the accompanying käyotsarga are completed the worshipper is again to recite the Sakra-stava and then, making the muktā-sukti-mudrā, to pronounce the pranidhāma-suttav.

- jaya viya-rāya jaga-guru hou mama tuha ppahāvao bhayavam bhova-mvveo maggānusāriyā ittha-phala-siddhī
- loga-vırıddha-ccāo guru-jana-pūā par'-attha-karanam ca suha-guru-jogo tav-vayana-sevanā ā-bhavam akhanāā

Hall, Jina, preceptor of the world, through your grace, blessed lord, may I achieve these things, daugst for the world, regular pursuit of the right path, attainment of deared results, abandonment of whatever is ill-famed in the world, respect for preceptors and parents, practice of help to others, attachment to a good guiu, and full obedience to his words for all existence.

It is evident from this description of the ritual that a considerable amount of time is required to carry out the cartya-anadana. In theory the layman should imitate the monk in performing it seven times a day, or if that is not possible five times, or if that too is beyond his powers, at least three times—at dawn, noon, and dusk. Not surprisingly therefore from an early date an abbreviated ritual is admitted. Three possibilities are in fact envisaged.'

- the best (uttama)—the complete ritual of the five dandakas preceded by the arryāpathiki-pratikramaņa,
- (11) the next best (madhyama)—this is considered to be either one chant (dandaka) (the arhac-cartya-stava), and one verse (stutt); or two dandakas (arhac-cartya-stava and Sakra-stava), and two stutts;
- (iii) the least satisfactory (jaghanya)—the namaskāra alone, or the Sakra-stava alone
- <sup>1</sup> CVBh 23; Ratnaśekhara, Śraddha-vidhi, p 56b, Vandhana-vidhāna-pañcāśaka, 2.

THE VANDANAKA

By its basic meaning of reverent salutation (condama or vandanaka), the thrid Tavalyaka would apply equally to the worship paid to the Jina, to the guru, or to the sacred scriptures; but though the Vandama-vahāma-pañcādaha, for example, is actually devoted to the cartya-wandama. In his explanation of the subject Hemacandar notes that, although in the texts quoted by him the person performing the vandanaka is always referred to as a monk, the ritual can equally well be carried out by a layman, yet it has to be admitted that of all the elements transferred from the monastur trutal this has been the least successfully accommodated to the śrâvakācāra.

In the form in which it appears in the works of Hemacandraand Devendra's the ritual has been subdivided into twenty-five essential constituents or āraiyakas (not of course to be confused with the six daily necessary duties) The Digambaras, though not adhering to this figure, give a very similar classification:

ŠVFTĀMBARA	DIGAMBARA
2 avanamana 1 yathā-jāta 12 āvartana or āvarta	2 nışadya or āsana 1 yathā-jāta 12 āvarta
4 śiras, or śiro-'vanati 3 gupta 2 praveśa	4 namaskāra or praņāma 3 šuddhi

Hemacandras's list is in fact, save for the last three items which are not counted by the Digambaras, identical with those given by Samantabhadra<sup>4</sup> and Cāmuṇḍarāya.<sup>5</sup>

1 niskramana

The ritual passage to be recited by Svetāmbaras during the vandanaka is known as the dvādaxāvarta-vandanaka-sātra or (from the phrase of address which recurs in it) kṣamā-sramana. It runs as follows. 6

icchāmi khamā-samaņo vandium jāvaņijāe nusīhiyāe (the guru: chandeņa) anujāṇaha me mīy'-oggaham (the guru: aṇujāṇāmi) nisīhi aho kāyam

```
<sup>5</sup> YS 311. 130 (p. 679).

<sup>2</sup> YS 111. 130 (pp. 659-86).

<sup>3</sup> Guru-vandana-bhāṣya</sup>

<sup>4</sup> RK v 18

<sup>5</sup> CS, p. 69
```

Both text and translation of this ritual passage are given with extensive explanatory details in Leumann, op cit, pp. 7-10.

käya-samphäsam khamanijjo bhe kılämo appa-kılantanam bahu-subhena bhe divaso vaikkanto (the guru taha ttı) jattā bhe (the guru tubbham pi vattai) javannjam ca bhe (the guru: evam) khāmemi khamā-samano devastyam vaikkamam (the guru aham avi khāmemi) āvassiyāe padikkamāmi khamā-samanānam devasīyāe āsāyanāe tettīs' annayarāe jam kimci micchāe mana-dukkadāe vaya-dukkadāe kāya-dukkadāe kohāe mānāe māyāe lobhāe savva-kāhyāe savva-micchovayārāe savva-dhammāikkamanāe jo me aiyāro kao tassa khamā-samano padikkamāmi nindāmi garihāmi appānam vosirāmi.

I desire to worship you, forbearing monk,1 with very intense concentration. (The guru: Willingly.) Allow me to enter the measured space. (The puru 1 allow you) Allow my bodily contact on the lower part of your body. Please suffer this annoyance. You will have spent the whole day fortunately little disturbed. (The guru: Yes.) You are making spiritual progress. (The guru Yes and so are you ) You are unperturbed by your sense organs? (The guru. Yes.) I ask pardon, forbearing monk, for my daily transgressions. (The guru: I too ask pardon ) Necessarily I make bratikramana to you, forbearing monk, for any day-by-day lack of respect, for any of the thirty-three āśātanās, anything done amiss through mind, speech, or body, through anger, pride, deceit, or greed, through false behaviour and neglect of the sacred doctrine at any time. whatever offence may have been committed by me, forbearing monk, I confess and reprehend and repent of it and cast aside my past self

The stages or sthanas of the vandanaka are marked by the responses (abhılāpa) of the guru, which have been given the following labels, taken from the expressions used in the text:

- (I) icchā, (4) yātrā; anuiñānanā. (5) väpanä:
- avvābādha.
- (6) aparādha-ksāmanā.

The following description of the ritual is furnished by Hemacandra. as he intends it to apply to the lay life the word sisya (neophyte) is here throughout replaced by 'layman';

The layman who wishes to perform the vandanaka waits some distance away from the monk, holding a rajo-harana in his hand and wearing a mukha-vastrikā, which he has subjected to pratilekhana. He begins to recite the formula and when the guru says 'chandena' he makes the first avanamana or reverence and comes up to him making pratilekhana and pramārjana. Putting his rajo-harana on the ground close to the monk and taking off his mukha-vastrikā, he leaves it on his left knee. He then touches the

This rendering is chosen to harmonize with Hemacandra's interpretation rajo-harana with his hands and then his own forehead. Six āvartas -this is the name given to a gesture in which the joined palms of the hands are moved from right to left-are made whilst he slowly repeats the third sthana. Then keeping his gaze fixed on the guru and making the añjali he continues to recite. The movement of hands between rajo-harana and forehead is resumed as the recitation continues until he has completed the sixth sthana. At the words khāmemi khamā-samano he applies both his hands and his forehead to the raio-harana and when reaches the phrase tassa khamā-samano padikkamāmi he gets up and moves out of the proximity of the monk. After this exit and a second entry he repeats the same ritual.

Hemacandra's description apparently refers to the third variety of vandanaka mentioned at the commencement of Devendra's Guru-vandana-bhāsya,1 where the following types are listed:

- (1) spheta(Prakrit plutta)-consisting of inclinations of the head (addressed to the congregation of monks);
- (ii) chobha—a double recitation of the ksamā-sramana (addressed to ordinary individual monks).
- (iii) dvādašāvarta-the full ritual, this too being repeated (destined for ascetics of higher standing).

Certain elucidations of the ritual are available from the texts particularly from Hemacandra2 and from Siddhasena Sūri's commentary on the Pravacana-sāroddhāra,3 Thus the expression ksamā-śramana is understood by the former as implying that an ascetic is possessed of the ten elements making up the dharma the first of which is ksamā 'forbearance'. One avanamana or obeisance is made at the end of the first sthana in each recitation of the ksamā-śramana. By vathā-jata is meant the full accoutrement of the monk: rajo-harana (the little broom that is used to carry out pramariana), mukha-vastrika (the strip of cloth worn in front of the mouth), and the pieces of material allowed -at least by the Svetambaras-for clothing. The monastic initiation is conceived of as a second birth, the hands clasped in the affialt being held to symbolize the folded hands of the child issuing from the womb. Whether the layman should make use of the rajoharana and mukha-vastrikā, the special symbols of the ascetic condition, is sometimes questioned but the Svetāmbara texts used in this study depict them as essential in a number of rites. The six deartar of each repetition are to accompany the following words or phrases of the ritual: aho, käyam, käya-samphäsam, jattä bhe, javanijam bhe, two being assigned to the last. Two siras (inclination of the head) are to be made in each repetition of the ritual: one by the layman when he recites khämem hhamā-samano devasiyam evabhamam and one by the monk when he replies aham avi khāmem tume. At the first sthäna of the kṣtanā-śramana the monk may, if he is not in a position at the moment to accept the vandamaka, reply twithema ('Make your reverence in mind, speech, and body') thereby cutting short the ritual. The repetition which is characteristic of the full ritual is explained on the analogy of an envoy bringing a message to a king and making obeisance both before and after speaking.

<sup>1</sup> Guru-vandana-bhäsva, 1. 2 YS 111 130 (pp. 665-76). 2 PS 93-174. C 787

Other elements of the vandanaka are given the form of numerical apothegms, in particular the thirty-thor faults (dasai)<sup>2</sup> and the thirty-three failures to express respect (āiātanāi)<sup>2</sup> but, devoted as these are to the minutiae of monkish life, they cannot be said to have any real existence in the lay ritual though enumerated by Hemacandra and Devendra. It will be enough to mention here the division of the gurt-āiātanās mot three types: <sup>3</sup>

- most conspicuous (uthrsta)—those concerned with actions contrary to the guru's command,
- (ii) next most conspicuous (madhyama)—those referring to contact with impurities,
- (iii) least conspicuous (jaghanya)—those concerned with touching the fect or other limbs of the guru

The vandamaba is associated with a number of other rites such as the prathramana, in fact it might be said to be implicit in any rite which involves the concourse of the guru. If no monk is present a convenient device for which canonical authority is claimed exists to ensure the satisfactory completion of the rite, this is the fiction of the sthapanacarya.

Just as the Jina can be conceived in terms of nāma, sthāpanā, dravya, and bhāru so can these categories be applied to the ācārya, and the sthāpanācārya will then signify the guru represented by a statue or by some symbolic object. To this the worshipper performs the vandanaka, keeping the guru present in his mind. Special abātanās are devised to cover actions implying lack of respect to the kābāpanācārya.¹ The practice is clearly set out in Devendra's Srādhha-dina-krtya'a ind Hemacandra¹ had earlier laid down that one should imagine in one's mind an embodiment of the guru if he is not himself present (guru-vruhe guru-sthāpanām manasikṛteā).

&lt;sup>2</sup> YS 111. 130 (pp 661-4) <sup>3</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 71a.

Ibid. (pp. 676–8).
 ŚrDK 230.

THE PRATIKRAMANA AND ALOCANA

The pratikramana, the fourth of the āraiceakas, generally inked with an avowal of past transgressions (ālocanā) is a manifestation of contrition and desire for amendment expressed by the recitation of certain confession formulae. Various types of pratikramaṇa, mainly based on the period of time to which the confession refers, are recognized 5

- performed at nightfall and referring to the past day (daivasika);
- performed at dawn and referring to the past night (prābhātika or rātrika),
- (3) covering the past pakṣa or half-month (pākṣika);
- (4) covering the past four months (cāturmāsika);
   (5) covering the past year (vārşika);
- (5) covering the past year (varsika);
- (6) referring to the unwitting harm caused by all movement (airyāpathikī).

The acceptance of pratikramaṇa only as an annual duty or as a duty to be carried out only during the additional leisure of the caturmāsa or rainy season is a characteristic of later texts.

It will be convenient to deal first with the aryāpathiki-pratikramaṇa, which has a special importance notably as forming the prelude to the caitya-vandana. The aryāpathiki-sūtra runs as follows:

ıcchāmı padıkkamium iriyā-vahiyāe virāhaņāe gamaņ'-āgamaņe pāņ'akkamaņe bīy'-akkamaņe hariy'-akkamaņe osāy'-uttinga-paṇaga-dagamattı-makkada-santāna-sankamane 1e me jīvā vīrāhiyā eg'-indiyā

Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 73b.
 ŚrDK 230, where the term sūri, explained as sthāpanācārya, is used.

YS in. 124 (p. 611).
 See Schubring, Die Lehre der Jainas, p. 177.
 YS ni. 130 (p. 687).
 Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 158b.

<sup>7</sup> YS III. 124 (pp. 605-7).

be-indiyā te-indiyā caur-indiyā pañc'-indiyā abhihayā vattiyā lesiyā sanghāiyā sanghattiyā pariyāviyā kalāmiyā uddaviyā thānāo thānam saṃkāmiyā jīviyāo vavaroviyā tassa micchāmi dukkaḍam

I want to make pratileramana for injury on the path of my movement, in coming and in going, in treading on laving things, in treading on seeds, in treading on green plants, in treading on deep, on becales, on mould, on most earth, and on cobwebs, whatever living organisms with one or two or three or four or five senses have been injured by me or knocked over or crushed or squashed or touched or mangled or hurt or affrighted or removed from one place to another or deprived of life—may all that evul have been done in vain.

Hemacandra says that iryā-patha may be taken in the literal sense as' the path of onc's going' or it may be understood to mean 'the line of conduct of an ascetuc' the primary infraction of which would be the destruction of any form of life the import of the situr aremain in either case the same. The avaiyāya (Patrit osāya) is explained as a jala-visi-a, the uttinga is an insect of the form of a dung-beetle which makes holes in the ground, panaka is explained as pañac-aranolli, the moist earth will contain ap-kāya and pritvi-kāyas. The phrase which recurs in all the pratite anand ormulae micchām dukkadam is given its proper sanskritustion mithyā me dushrtam ('may the evil of it be in vain') but at the same time the individual aksaras are said to have the following symbolic meaning:'

mi-miu-maddava 'gentleness' chā—dosānam chāyana 'the veiling of faults' mi, me—a-merāe thiya 'abiding in the limitless' du—dugañchāmı appānam 'I loath myself' ka—kadam me pāvam 'I have commuted sin'

da-devemi tam uvasamenam 'I go beyond it through attaining to calm'

In general, apart from the rectation of the airyāpathiki formula, the performance of prathraman requires the presence of a gurthraman requires the presence of a guru. The ritual passages used for this and for the ālocanā are given below in the sequence in which they normally follow the vandanaka formula, beginning with the aticārālocanā.

ucchā-kārena samdusaha bhagavam devasiyam āloium (the guru. āloaha) iccham āloemi jo me devasto avyāro kao kāto vāto māṇasto ussutto ummaggo akappo akaraṇijo dujhāyo duvvicutto aṇāyāro aṇicchiyavvo asāvagapäoggo nāṇe daṇṇaṇe cāritlācaritte sue sāmāiye tiṇham guttinaṃ cauṇham kasāyānam pahcanhaṃ aṇu-vvayānam tinham guna-vvayānam caunhaṃ sikhhā-vayāṇam bārasavihassa sāvaga-dhammassa jam khaṇḍiyaṃ jam virāluyam tassa muchāmi dukkaḍam.

<sup>1</sup> YŚ 111 124 (p 607) 2 YŚ 111. 130 (pp. 679-82).

Instruct me, lord, at my own desire to make allocand for the day (The gairs: Dos.)) wish to make allocand: whatever fault has been committed by me during the day in body, speech, or mind, in contravention of the scriptures and of right conduct, unfitting and improper to be done, the mediated and all conceived, immoral and undestrable, unbecoming for a layman, in regard to knowledge and philosophy and the lay life and the holy writ and the sămâyina, and whatever transgression or infraction I may have committed in respect of the three guptis and four kaṣāyina, and the five amt-vertata, three gunne-vertata, and four sikād-vertat, that is to say, the layman's twelvefold rule of conduct—may that evil have been done in vain.

Hemacandra explains that cāritrācāritra is equivalent to deśavirati. Khandita implies a partial violation of the religious duties and virādhita a more serious violation but neither of them amounts to a complete bhanga.

After this alocana formula the worshipper is to recite the pratikramana-bira-sūtra-1 savvassa vi devasiya duccintiya dubbhāsiya duccetthiya icchā-kārena sandisaha bhagavam (the guru; padikkamaha) tassa micchāmi dukkadam

Instruct me at my own desire to make pratikramaņa for all that I have done amiss this day in thought, in speech, and in act (The guru: Do so) —may that evil have been done in vain.

Then comes the request for forgiveness, the ksāmanā-sūtra:2

icchā-kārena sandisaha bhagavam abbhuttho 'mhi abbhintara-dezanyam kinemum ucham khāmemi devasiyam jam kima: apatiyam para-patityam bhātle pāņe vinaye veyvaoace ālāve samlāra ucc'-sīsane sam'-āsane antara-bhāsāe ucari-bhāsāe uvari-bhāsāe jam kinuc majiha viņaya-parhīņam suhumam od bēvaram vē tibbhe sinaha aham na sināma tisas micchām dukhadam

Instruct me, lord, at my own dearre; I am come forward to seek forgiveness for what is within the day. I want to seek forgiveness for whatever unfriendly or excessively unfriendly thing I have done this day in regard to eating and drinking, in regard to vinaya and vanyarytya, in regard to speech and conversation, in regard to seating oneself at a higher or at the same level as the guru, or in interrupting him when he is speaking, or in speaking louder than he, may whatever offence against vinava, great or small, which you know and I do not know, have been done in vain

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ibid. (pp. 682-3) <sup>2</sup> Ibid (pp. 683-5).

In all these formulae the word dawastka will be replaced by the appropriate variant if the pratikramana refers to the night or to some other period.

The great importance of the bratikramana in Jamism is evident from the way in which the meaning of the term is extended to cover all edifying religious practices, the scope of the numerous pratikramana-sūtras being very wide indeed.1 Amongst the faults to be avowed are all forbidden things done and all duties left undone, all infringements of the twelve vratas, all offences against the ratnatrava, all the evil results of parigraha and arambha, all actions motivated by passion and hate, all partiality for false creeds and dissemination of false dogmas, and all wrong done in the course of one's daily business or one's household duties.

The best-known pratikramana commentary is the Vandāru-vrtti of Devendra. Here as elsewhere bratikramana for the eighteen sources of sin (pāpa-sthānas) is recommended. It may therefore be not mappropriate to list these here 2

```
(1) killing (prām-vadha, himsā)
(2) lying (asatya)
                                     the themes of the five
(3) thieving (adattadana)
                                       anu-vratas
(4) unchastity (abrahma, maithuna)
 (5) acquisitiveness (parigraha)
 (6) anger (krodha)
 (7) pride (māna)
 (8) deceit (māvā)
 (9) greed (lobha)
(10) attachment (rāga, preman)
(11) hatred (dvesa)
```

- (12) disputation (kalaha)
- (13) false accusation (abhyākhyāna)
- (14) backbiting(paisunva)
- (15) denigration (parivada, minda)

The pratikramana is sometimes given a more ornate literary form as in the elegant Pañcovonsatika of Ratnäkara Súri. In this poem the Jina is invoked almost as a personal god

<sup>2</sup> See PS 1351-3 and SrDK 300-2

- (16) depression and elation (arati-rati)
- (17) deceitful speech (māyā-mrsā)
- (18) false belief (mithyātva).

In another version of the eighteen pāpa-sthānas eating by night (rātri-bhojana) is inserted in the list after parigraha and arati-rati omitted.

The keynote of the pratikramaṇa is best expressed in the well-known verse from the sūtra:

khāmemi savva-jīve savve jīve khamantu me metts me savva-bhūesu veram majjha na kenavi²

I ask pardon of all living creatures, may all of them pardon me, may I have friendship with all beings and enmity with none.

It is probably because in this way the pratikramana represents the pervasion of the mind by the feeling of ahinnia that it comes to be regarded as the central feature of the avasyakas. Like the other avasyakas it may be performed either in the temple or in a popadhasila, or in the presence of a monk or at home, and like them it requires the elimination of all arta-dhyana. It is sometimes said that the pratyakhyana it is best expressed three times, first mentally when alone, then before the image of the Jina, and finally aloud before the guru. It is not always necessarily confined to past time and may therefore overlap with pratyakhyana.

Together with ālocanā it is often given the designation of prāyaścitta but the kāyotsarga too is a form of prāyaścitta.

THE PRATYĀKHYĀNA

This, the fifth, or, according to the Digambaras, the suxth, ācaiyaha has been defined by Amtagati's as the avoidance of what is unfitting in order to prevent the commission of sin in the future. In a sense it is the equivalent of pratiferamana translated into future time, Ideally it should be performed three times in solitude, before the Jina image and in the presence of a guru when it is linked with the vandanaka.

- Siddhasena Sun on PS 1351-3
- 3 Sr (A) vm. 35.

- 2 Pratikramana-sūtra, 49.
- 4 Śraddha-vidhi, p. 73b.

Pratyakhyāno' is said to be of two kinds according to whether it relates to the māla-grana (i.e. in the case of laymen the anuvarais) or to the utiava-grana(i.e. the guna- and ikiṣā-vratus), many of which may in fact be regarded as expressions of pratyakhyūna; that is particularly true of the dig-, deiswakāsha-, hhogopahhoga-, and posadhopawisa-vratus. Renunciation of any form of enjoyment is implient in the concept but in practice it most often implies abstention from food, or from a particular kind of food, for a certain period of time.

There are traditionally ten categories of pratyākhyāna, but Hemacandra,¹ recognizing that these are without relevance for the lay doctrine, has preferred to discuss only the ninth and tenth: sanketa-pratyākhyāna and addha-pratyākhyāna, which, he says, are in daily use. The former, as its name indicates, is symbolic; the devotee refrains from taking food for as long, for example, as he keeps his hand clenched, and by this renunciation he recalls his mind to his religious duties. Eight types of sanketa-pratyākhyāna are lissted:

- (1) angustha-'as long as I do not unclasp my thumb';
- (2) must—'as along as I do not unclench my hand',
- (3) granthi-'as long as I do not loosen this knot';
- (4) grha-'as long as I do not enter my house';
- (5) sveda—'as long as these sweat drops do not dry';
- (6) uechvāsa—'as long as these respirations continue' (i.e. for a given number of them),
- (7) stibuka—'as long as the drops of moisture do not dry on this bed';
- (8) jyoticka—'as long as this lamp is not extinguished.'

Much more important is the addhā-pratvākhyāna for which a full ritual appropriate rather to the monastic, than to the lay, life, exists. This is classified into ten categories 1

- namaskāra-sahīta—abstention from food for the duration of a muhūrta;
- (2) pauruși-abstention from food for the duration of a pauruși;
- (3) dina-pūrcārddha—abstention from food for the first half of the day;
- (4) ekāšana-eating only one meal during the day;

- (5) eka-sthāna<sup>1</sup>—taking food only in one position, i.e. without moving any limbs except the hands and mouth;
- (6) ācāmāmla—eating only ācāmāmla;
- (7) abhaktārtha (upavāsa)—fasting from the fourfold aliments or from three of them;
- (8) carama—abstention from food until the end of the twenty-four-hour period, or from certain things until the end of one's life;
- (9) abhıgraha—a spectal vow of some kind; it may cover various types of kāla-nıyama or any of the forms of sanketa-pratyākhyāna previously listed;
- (10) vikrti-myedha—abstention from consuming any of the vikrtis.

The formulae used in each case are as follows.2

 uggae süre namokkära-sahıyam paccakkhāmi cawvuham pi āhāram asanam pānam khāimam sāimam annatth' anābhogenam sahasāgārenam vosirāmi

When the sun is risen I renounce for as long as the namathāra lasts the fourfold aliments and except for cases of unawareness or of force majeure abandon them.

Hemacandra here refutes the argument that as no period of time is mentioned this should be properly called a form of sanketapratyākhyāna. There are two licit grounds for breaking this pratyākhyāna termed ākāras.<sup>3</sup>

 porssiyam paccakkhāmu uggae sūre cauvviham pi āhāram asanam pānam khāmam sāimam annatih' anābhogenam sahusāgareņam pacchamnakālenam disā-mohenam sāhu-vayanenam savva-samāhv-vattsy'-āgāreṇam vostrāmu

When the sun is risen I renounce for the duration of a poursif the fourfold aliments and except for cases of unawareness or of force majeure or of overcast skies or of confusion of north and south or of instructions from a monk or except in order to attain full tranquillity of mind I abandon them.

The possibilities of legitimately breaking this pratyākhyāna are

- ' In the Digambara tradition this is held to mean 'taking only once from a platter'.
  - <sup>2</sup> YS 111. 130 (pp 698-710) and SrDK 79 (pt. 1, pp. 228-35).
- <sup>1</sup> This word seems to have acquired the sense here of 'contingency' because of its repeated occurrence in the compounds which express the possibilities of exception to the vow.

six in number. The third and fourth are admitted because the passage of time has to be calculated from the varying length of one's shadow. The last is designed to provide for the contingency that a person may be suddenly afflicted by an acute pain provoking ārta-dhyāna or raudra-dhyāna; his tranquillity of mind is lost until he takes medicine to alleviate it.

3. süre uggae purım'-addham paccakkhām cauvviham pi āhāram asanam pāṇam khāumam sāmam annatth' anābhogenam sahasāgārenam pacchanna-kālenam disā-mohenam sāhu-vayanenam mahattar'-āgārenam savva-samah-vatty'-āgārenam vossrām

An additional contingency (ākāra) is inserted: 'or except for more important business', this being understood to mean something done on behalf of the community that a third party could not perform and of equal souritual merit with the pratyāhyāna.

4. egäsanam paccakkhāmi cauvviham pi āhūram asanam pānam khāimami sāmam amantih unābhogenam sahasāgārenam sāgātīy-āgārenam āmu sahaspasārenam guru-abbhutthūnenam pāritthāvanyi-āgārenam mahatta adrenam sovoa-samāhi-vativ'-āsārnam vosirāmi

I take only the skaliana otherwise renouncing the fourfold aliments and except for cases of unawareness or of force majeure or of house-holder's business or except when the food offered has to be rejected or except for more important business or except in order to attain full tranquility of mind I abandon them, not moving except for contortions and stretchings of the body or in rising to salute the guite.

There are now eight ākāras in this form of pratyākhyāna. It is noted that the Prakiti egāsaṇa may be interpreted either as 'eating one meal' or 'eating in one posture'. Certain of the ākāras refer to posture and not to actual fasting.

5. ega-ihāṇam paccakkhām: cauvviham pi āhāram asaṇam pāṇam khāmam sāmam unnatth anāhhogenam sahasāgārenam sāgārty-āgārenam guru-abbhutthānenam pāritthāvamy'-āgārenam mahattar'-āgārenam savva-samāh-vatty'-āgārenam vostrām;

This is identical with the preceding formula except for the omission of auntana-pasarenam.

 āyambılam paccakkhāmi annatih anābhogenam sahasāgārenam levālevenam gihattha-samsatthenam ukkhitta-vivegenam pāritthāvamy'āgārenam mahattar'-āgārenam savva-samāhi-vattiy'-āgārenam vossrāmi For the ācāmāmla-pastyālbiyāma I renounce and abandon everything and except for cases of unawareness or of force magner or where other food has stuck to or been scraped off the platter or where other food has not been separated or where the householder's pot contains other substances or when the food offered has to be rejected or for more important business or in order to attain to full tranquillity of mind I abandon them.

7. süre uggae abhatt'-attham paccakkhāms cauvviham pi āhāram asanam pānam khāmam sāimam annatth' anābhogenam saha-sīgārenam pāritṭhāvany'-āgārenam mahattar'-āgārenam savva-samāhi-vattvy'-āgārenam oosirāmi

When the sun is risen I renounce for this fasting the fourfold aliments and except for cases of unawareness or of force majeure or when the food offered has to be rejected or except for more important business or except in order to attain full tranquality of mind I abandon them.

Here the pārisṭhāpanika contingency is not in fact applicable if the fourfold aliments are renounced.

pānassa levādena vā alevādeņa vā acchena vā bahulena vā sasitthena vā

I abandon the fourfold aliments except for liquids viscous or nonviscous or transparent or turbid or mixed with rice grains or not mixed with rice grains.

These six ākāras are formulated to cover the case of the modified form of fasting in which liquids may still be taken.

 dsvasa-cerimam bhava-carimam vä paccakkhāmi cauvviham pi āhāram asanam pānam khāimam sāimam annatth' anābhogenam sahasāgārenam mahattar'-āgāi enam savva-samāhu-vattīy'-āgārenam vosīrāmi

Whether this is to last till the end of the day or to the end of one's life four akara spaly, and for this reason it is in the former meaning distinct from ekasana-pratyakhyana. On the other hand abstention from ratir-bhoyana is an expression of bhava-carima-pratyakhyana.

9. For the various types of billa-niyama and sanketa-pratybik-yāna four ākāras prevail: annatth' anābhogenam sahasāgārenam mahattar' āgārenam savva-samāhn-vaitiy'-āgārenam. However, in the case of a vow to renounce clothing (aprāvaraņābhigraha) a fitth ākāra' cola-pattga'-āgārenam' is also operative.

10. vigato paccakkhāmi annatth' anābhogenam sahasāgārenam levālevenam phattha-samsatthenam ukkhitta-vivegenam paducca-makkhienam paritthāvanīv'-āpārenam mahattar'-āgārenam savva-samāhī-vattīv'-āgārenam vosirāmi

I renounce the vikrtis and except for cases of unawareness or of force majeure or where other food has stuck to and been scraped off the platter or where the householder's pot contains other substances or where other food has not been separated or because the butter has been kept beyond its due time or when the food offered has to be rejected or except for more important business or except in order to attain to full tranquillity of mind I abandon them.

A rough-and-ready test is applied in the case of the sixth of these ākāras.

As has already been noted, the bhogopabhoga-vrata is one of the vratas expressing forms of pratyākhyāna. The vamas mentioned by Samantabhadra1 would belong under bhava-carıma-pratyākhyāna and the nivamas under abhigraha-pratyakhyana Corresponding to the latter the Svetāmbaras have a traditional list of fourteen nivamas expressed in the following verse.

> saccıtta-davva-vıgaı-vānaha-tambola-vattha-kusumesu vāhana-sayana-vilevana-bambha-disi-nhāna-bhattesu2

The two lists are closely related, both of course depending ultimately on the twenty-one abhierahas or undertakings to observe restraint, which are accorded an important place in the Upāsakadas

Svetambara	SAMANTABHADRA
(1) sacrtta (green leaves and shoots)	sangita (instrumental music)
(2) dravya (food other than sacitta and vikrti)	gita (singing)
(3) vikṛti (the hcit six)
(4) upānah (sandals)
(5) tambola (betel)	tambola
(6) vastra (clothes)	vasana
(7) kusuma (flowers)	kusuma
(8) vāhana (vehicles, rīdīng	vāhana animals)

tnašekhara (Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 71a) and Yasovijava (Dharmasamgraha, 1 73).

- (9) sayana (beds) sayana
  (10) abrahma (sexual intercourse) manmatha
  (11) vilepana (cooling pastes and unguents) anga-rāga
- (12) dtk1 (restriction of movement to fixed limits)
- (13) snāna (bathing)
- (14) bhakta (restriction of food to bhojana. fixed quantities)

THE KAYOTSARGA

snāna

THE kāyotsarga, the fifth, or for the Digambaras the sixth, acaiyaka is also for the Svetāmbaras the fifth pratimā. Despite its status in the literature as a separate ācaiyaka it is, in reality, an adjunct to other rites, in Amitagati's' words 'the undisturbed abandonment of the body in all ācaiyakat.

The so-called kāyotsarga-sūtra runs as follows 3 tatsu uttari-karaneman pdyacchtta-karaneman usohi-karaneman viadikaraneman pavaiman kammanam mgghdyon'-atthde thami kausaggam amattha tiaasenam misasenam khaisenam chienam jambhäeqenam udduenam vdya-nsaggenam bhamalie pitta-mucchde suhumehm anga-sañadikim ushumehm diba-sañadikim suhumehm diba-sañadikim suhumehm diba-sañadikim awam-dehim digarehm abhaggo avarahio huju me käussaggo jäva arihantänam bhagavan-tänam mamokkaremam na päremi täva käysim thänenam mänevam jänenam appänam voströmi.

Making an additional effort, making penance, making purification, extracting evil from myself, I tand in the kdystarge in order to make an end to sinful acts. With the exception of inhaling and exhaling, coughing and sneezing, yawning and hiccoughing, breaking wind, giddiness, and swooning, every slight movements of the limbs, the eyes, and the saliva, and similar involuntary acts may my kdyotsarge be unbroken and unimpared; until I have completed the rectation of the namakriar to the blessed arhats I shall cast assde my body in the standing position, in selence and in meditation.

Hemacandra etymologizes prāyaścitta as 'that which in general (prāyas) purifies the mind (ctta)'. By the final phrase he understands that the termination of any kāyotsarga is to be marked by the recitation of the pañca-namaskāra. He further notes that the word appānam is omitted in some texts: If it is to be retained it must mean 'body'.

This of course is, in effect, the dig-virata.

Sr(A) viii, 36.

YS iii, 130 (pp. 607-11)

In another passage Hemacandra defines the hāyoturga¹ as 'standing silent in meditation without other movement than the involuntary movements of the body such as breathing, for a definite time until the paña-namashāra is recited.' It may be performed either:

- (1) because of activities (cestā), for example, in connexion with the airyāpathikī-pratikramana; or
- (ii) for the sake of self-mastery (abhibhava), i.e. to win victory over upasarpas.<sup>2</sup>

The former type is always brief, varying from eight to a thousand ucchvāsas. The latter will not be less than a muhūria and may, as in the case of Bāhubali.<sup>3</sup> last for as long as a year <sup>4</sup>

Numerous forms of the khylotarga, characterized by slight differences of posture, are noted in the monastic discipline. For the layman Hemacandra¹ recognizes three main types upright, (ucchiria), scated (upaviifa), and recumbent (sayita). Each of these again can be subdivided into four categories which for the upright position would be

- upright physically and upright spiritually (the mind being in dharmva- or śukla-dhvāna):
- (11) upright physically but not spiritually;
- (iii) upright spiritually but not physically;
- (iv) upright neither spiritually nor physically.

This classification, for which there are many parallels in other spheres of Jainism, lies at the basis of that used by Amitagati, 5

- uparistoparista—a seated posture with arta- or raudradhvana;
- (ii) upavistotthita—a seated posture with dharmya- or śukladhyāna;
- 1 YS m 130 (p 693)
- For a description of the upasargas see YS us. 153
- 3 The figure whose kāyottarga is represented in the famous statue of Śrāvana Belgola 5 Śr (A) vin <7-61 4 YS in. 130 (p. 694).

- (iii) utthitopavista-an upright posture with arta- or raudradhvāna:
- (iv) utthitotthita-an upright posture with dharmva- or sukladhvāna.

But such classifications represent little more than the subtleties of the schoolmen; the essential, it is stressed, is that without pure meditation the kāyotsarga can serve no purpose.

As has already been noted the kavotsarga is, properly, an accessory to the performance of the avasvakas and of such rites as the posadhopavāsa. Amitagati and Āśādhara,2 for example, prescribe a total of twenty-eight kavotsargas for the necessary duties; six for the vandanaka, eight for the pratikramana, two for the voga-bhakti, and twelve for the svādhyāya, and the precise duration of each of them in ucchvasas is also fixed. The same minutiae of detail are found in the descriptions of the blemishes (dosas) of the kavotsarga: Hemacandra3 notes twenty-one such faults, the Mūlācāra gives twenty-three, and Amitagatis raises the figure to thirty-two. All these lists relate in fact to the monastic life and have no real relevance to the śranakacara.

When the layman engages in the kavotsarga particularly, as Abhayadevas notes, by night at a crossroads he will need to be of stout heart for he will be assailed by upasargas and parisahas.6 These he must withstand but there are some legitimate reasons for interrupting the exercise; he is to be excused if he utters a cry because he himself or another person has been bitten by a snake or because bandits make an incursion or again if he interposes himself to save a living creature, as, for example, a mouse from the claws of a cat.7 But the ideal picture of the kāyotsarga remains that of Hemacandra's verse, 'At dead of night he stands in the kāvotsarga outside the city wall and the bullocks taking him for a post rub their flanks against his body,'8

```
1 Śr(A) viii. 66-67.
```

<sup>3</sup> YS m 130 (pp. 694-6).

<sup>5</sup> P (SrUP) 17

<sup>7</sup> YS 111, 124 (p. 610)

<sup>2</sup> SDhA vi. 27

<sup>4</sup> Sr (A) viii 88-08 6 For the parisahas see YS in. 153.

* YS m. 144.

THE PUJA

PO1A, often called tjyå or yajña, the one form of 'sacrifice' possible to a Jaina, is the only major element of the layman's religion which is not discussed in the canonical works and the only one which may be said to belong exclusively to the lay life. Closely associated with the āraiyyakas, 't it is often by the Svetāmbaras voluntarily confounded with the caitya-vandana, which is sometimes held to be equivalent to dravya-pājā and bhāra-pājā together, sometimes bhāra-pājā alone. It will be convenient to make a distinction by treating under the head of pājā those matters which form part of the Pājā-valhāma-pārācāsaka and under caitya-vandana those which make up the subject-matter of the Vandana-vahdāna-pārācāsaka.

Phija is not of course restricted to the adoration of the Jina's mage, the cartya, either in the temple or none's home; it may be offered to all those who, like the Jinas, have attained to final release, to monks whether sadhus or acaryas, to the holy writ, and even to parents and elders. Sometimes the meaning of the word is arbitrarily expanded to include the construction of temples and images, the carrying out of pigrimages, the copying of the scriptures, the foundation of almshouses, the recitation of mantras, even the giving of alms (regarded as the pijā of the atitith). On the other hand it may be presented as a mere aspect of dana—in Hemacandra's terms, the sowing of wealth on the Jina-bimba-kiptra.<sup>4</sup>

The custom of pājā is manifestly one of Janism's earliest conscious instantions of the Hindu world around, a transference which was all the easier because the ceremony can be conceived as a simulacrum of the sameasana, that gathering where the Tirthańkara preached to men and gods who rendered pājā to him with all that was most priceless. On entering the temple, advisedadara,' one should say to oneself, 'This is the samaoaiarana, this is the Jina, and these are they who sit in the assembly'. Medhavin even devotes the first three or four adhibāras of his irāva-havin even devotes the first three or four adhibāras of his irāva-

It has already been mentioned that the sāmāyika, originally conceived of as a period of meditation, gradually took on the character of a formal act of worship, in which praise was offered to the Jina It was then but a step to the offering of material objects—the pūjā.

<sup>2</sup> YS III. 124 (p 655) 4 YS III. 120 (p 584)

&lt;sup>2</sup> SDhA 11 25 <sup>5</sup> SDhA v1. 10

kācāra to a description of a samavasaraņa. But this worship of the Jina, even if it responds to a basic human need, can yield only a subjective satisfaction. The Tīrthankara, immersed in their timeless beatitude, are inaccessible to human entreaties, derive no satisfaction from the offerings of their votaries. Indi, since neither the lifeless image nor the being it represents are benefited by the pājā, how can this be commendable since it inevitably involves destruction of life? To this objection the reply is that the individual who offers the pājā achieves through viewing the image a tranquillity that is a source of punya. For those therefore whose livelihood necessarily provokes the destruction of living creatures it is hypocrisy to shy at the Jina-pūjā on the ground that it involves himā, 2.

Certain Digambaras—Jinasena,¹ Cāmundarāya,⁴ and Āśādhara⁵ (as well as Medhāvin and Vāmadeva)—give a rather unreal division of pūjā into five types.

- (i) the daily worship (nitya-maha)—the ordinary pūjā in one's home or in the temple. This term is also used to cover the construction of temples,
- pūjā made by diademed kings (caturnukha or sarvatobhadra or mahā-maha);
- (iii) pūjā made by cakravartins to fulfil all desires (kalpa-druma); (iv) pūjā lasting for eight days (astāhniki) offered by the rulers
- (iv) puja lasting for eight days (astamma) offered by the rulers of the devas in Nandiśvara-dvīpa or by mortals during the Nandiśvara-parvan;
- (v) pūjā offered by the devas at the five kalyāṇas and in uncreate temples (andra-dhvaja).

Of these the first type alone is germane to the discussion, the fourth is best considered under the head of yārrā with other festivals; and the other three have but a theoretical significance, the third and fifth belonging really to the realm of mythology.

The daily pūjā, like the āvasyakas, may, as in Vasunandin's work, be classified on rather artificial lines according to the categories of nāma, sthāpanā, dravya, ksetra, kāla, and bhāva:

(i) reciting the names of the Jinas (nāma-pūgā);6

```
<sup>1</sup> Haribhadra's commentary on SrPr 345.

<sup>2</sup> P (P0ja) 41-45 and SrPr 344-50

<sup>3</sup> CS, p. 21

<sup>3</sup> SDA II. 24-28.

<sup>6</sup> Sr (V) 382.
```

- (ii) representing the Jina in an image (sthāpanā-pūjā). This may be either:
  - (a) sad-bhāva—the attribution of the Jina's qualities to an object having form; or
  - (b) asad-bhāva—the imagining mentally of a divine presence in the aksata or other objects offered in the pūjā;
- (iii) offering in an act of worship substances such as perfumes (dravva-pūjā);<sup>2</sup>
  - (a) sacitta-to the Jina or to the gurus,
  - (b) acitta-to the holy writ;
- (iv) worshipping places associated with the Jinas, their kalyāṇasthāṇas (kṣetra-pūjā),<sup>3</sup>
- (v) making pūjā on the anniversaries of the kalyānas or on such
- occasions as the Nandīśvara-parvan (kāla-pūjā);4
  (vi) worshipping mentally or by muttering formulae (japa) or by dhyāna (bhāva-pūjā).5

More significant in fact, however, is the simpler division, as given, for example, by Amitagati, into worship with offerings  $(dravya-p\bar{u}j\bar{a})$  and worship by mental concentration  $(bh\bar{a}va-p\bar{u}j\bar{a})$ .

Various lists of the offerings which should constitute the pijā are given by different writers often with indications of their symbolism; but before comparing them it is well to note the constituents of the act of worship at least as understood by the Digambaras.?

- (i) bathing the image (snapana, abhiseka);
- (ii) making the offerings (balı, arca, pūjā);
- (iii) chanting the praise of the Jina (stava, stuti);
- (iv) muttering the sacred formulae (japa)

The Svetāmbaras have a rather similar basic threefold division of pūjā which figures in all the descriptions of the caitya-vandana.8

- (i) aṅga-pūjā symbolized by puspa—flowers, clothes, ornaments, unguents;
- (ii) agra-pūjā symbolized by āhāra—water, fruit, rice, lamps;
- (iii) bhāva-pūjā symbolized by stuti—hymns of praise.
  - 1 Śr (V) 383-4 2 Śr (V) 448-51. 3 Śr (V) 452. 4 Śr (V) 453-5 5 Śr (V) 456-8. 6 Śr (A) xii. 12 7 SDhA v 11. CVBh 10.

At the same time there exist the distinctions of snapana (bathing) and sthāpana (making offerings) and of dravya-pūjā and bhāva-pūjā.

Here for purposes of comparison are the Śvetāmbara lists of 8, 17, and 21 forms of pöjä, the unnumbered list of the Pañtāuāka,¹ and the Digambara list of 11 given by Vāmadeva, as well as some items mentioned by Vasunandin¹ and in the Śrāvaka-dharmadohaka (see p. 220).¹

The eightfold worship (astopahāra) is the commonest numerical form given to the elements of the pijār it has superseded an earlier fivefold classification identical with the first five items on the list of eight, and has obtained general acceptance among Digambaras as well as Svetāmbaras, being noted at a rather earlier date by the former. Devasena, Hemacandra, Devendra, and Āšādhara ar amongst the writers who give the list. The figure is expanded in subsequent times; thus Vāmadeva among the Digambaras prefers a figure of eleven whilst among the Svetāmbaras the Pijā-prakarana, which has been fathered on Umāswāt but can scarcely be older than the fourteenth century, catalogues twenty-one elements of pijā which are almost identical with those noted by Cārttrasundara in the Aidropadaća. The other list with seventeen items which appears to be anterior to the list of twenty-one is quoted by Yasovijava.

The earliest work devoted exclusively to the pājā would seem to be the Pijā-pārāiaha. The author introduces the subject with some prudence, just as the labours of agriculture yield a good return if performed in due season so all religious duties should be carried out at the right tunes, these being in the case of the pijā the three sanāhyās.º If done in such a way that the householder's livelihood is interrupted they will in the end lead to no good, for the full religious life is possible only for the assectic.¹¹ But when the householder makes pijā even the servants assisting him have a share in its good results whilst those who continue their normal duties have only tool.¹²

The first requisite for the votary is purity of body and mind.

P (Pûjā) 14-15.
 Sr (V) 483-92.
 Doha 181-204
 BhS(D) 461-87. However, in this list for naivedya is substituted the triad of milk products: milk, curds, ghee.

5 YS iii 124 (p 601).

6 SrDK 26.

7 SDhA 11. 30.

<sup>6</sup> ÅU 11. 35-36.

O Dharma-sangraha, p. 134b.

P (P0jā) 4-5.
P (P0jā) 21.

220

JAINA YOGA

1
	STANDARD LIST	LIST OF	LIST OF
1	THOIR I	TWENTY-ONE	SHVENTERN	PASCASARA	ViMADEVA	UTHER DICAMBARAS
	gandha	Väsa	vāsa	candha concesa	L	CASCNANDIN, BIC)
9 6	puspa-maia, puspa	puspa	puspāruhana	cars arreadle.		candana
η.	SESSION OF THE PERSON OF THE P	tandula		alrata	puspa-mala	puşpa
+	ednup	dhūba	dhinorksens	JL	aksata	aksata
tr)	dipa	dipa	ding	aunuba	dhūba	dhūna
9	naivedya, caru	naisedva	daya.	drpa	dīpa	dina
7	phala	mhole	RADAME	balı	Can	ndin.
		Firms	sukha-phala-	1	photo	naivedya
00	el el		dhaukana		pirata	phala
•	7	Jala	1
0	1	dāman	mal Sur Lan	Jaia	Jala	18
9	1	notten	rigial dilana	kusuma-dāman	Dusnabitali	1
11.	1	pound	puspa-prakara	dadhı		hagard)a/i
12.		huga	puspa-grha	siddhärthaba		ghrta-payas
		Dhuşana	ābharana	hancana-ratna-	guanta	ghantā
13	1			mauktika		1
14.		snarra	snapana-vilepana	surahht-1 denne
1		vilepana	aritrika	and and and	1	abhiseka
2	1	cāmara	cuita	1	1	krātrika
ė	1	chattra		1	1	Commen
17.	1	vādstem	varnaka	1	1	Line
90		BIJIDE	\aditra			chattra
2 :	1	nrtya	nrtva		1	1
61	1	gīta	0	1	1	1
ç,	1	Stute		1	1
21	1		I	1		!
		ROSS-VEGGDI	i	1	-	1
				_	-	I

His normal livelihood must be unobjectionable, he must put away all evil and improper thoughts, concentrating his mind on religion. and he must avoid all actions within the temple that can be considered as āśātanās. Whilst taking precautions to minimize the himsā inherent in bathing he must wash himself before making the būiā since physical cleanliness for the layman both fosters and symbolizes spiritual purity through the destruction of baba.1 Aśadhara2 mentions five forms of bathing (snana) as far as the feet, the knees, the loins, the neck, or the head; ranging in other words from the mere washing of the feet to the full cleansing. As a prelummary to the pūjā one must bathe as far as the head or at least as far as the neck; or else its performance will have to be delegated to another person. Caritrasundara' recommends bathing as far as the neck, only in cases where this is ritual pollution in the home is bathing as far as the head desirable. For going to the temple clean clothes are always to be worn and muddy paths avoided.

A special ritual* is laid down for the setting up (pratisthā) of a Jina image, which is accounted a form of pājā in its larger signiticance, and here again the concept of a representation of the samaragarana dominates.

The ritual for the occasion, as described by Vasunandin, 4 is of a rather special kind but its elements are those which recur in all descriptions of pūjā, 5 Digambara and Švetāmbara.

Hemacandra's sites the pipā within the catiya-vandana ceremony after the triple circumambulation of the Jima image. It commences with the bathing ceremony followed by the designing of the tilaka with isi-ikhanda sandalwood paste and by the burning of incense. The image is then placed in a halaisa full of water to which various herbs have been added, garlands of flowers are set before it, it is bathed with milk and ghee together with water perfumed with camphor, saffron, iri-khanda, agallochum, and other scents, and anointed with the finest sandal paste. Then garlands of jūtī, campaka, sitapatīra, rucakila, and kamala flowers are placed before the Jina; it is dressed with clothes and with ornaments of gems, gold, pearls; the eight mangalata are designed with saddharthaka, jūti, and tandula seeds; lamps, and offerings of ghee and curds and sweet cakes are placed before it; a tilaka is made with sandal paste on the forehead, and lamps are waved before it in the ārātrika ceremony.

¹ P (Pojā) 9-13. ² SDhA it. 34. ³ ÅU it. 3-8
⁴ Vasunandın says that what he describes here is a form of iod-bhāva-sthāpanā-pājā as the asad-bhāva form is dangerous in a world deluded by false beliefs.

<sup>5</sup> YS 124 (pp. 600-1).

The eight mangalas1 are

- (1) svastika; (5) bhadrāsana (throne); (6) kalaša:
- (2) śrī-vatsa; (6) kalaśa; (3) nandyāvarta; (7) matsya (two fishes);
- (4) vardhamānaka; (8) darpana (mirror).

A description and explanation of these is given by Kirfel.2

Devendra, in the Śrāddha-dina-krtya, notes that for pūjā in the home the worshipper is to be clad in white and to wear a mukhavastrikā. Bathing of the image in water perfumed with sandal and camphor and inunction with go-sirva sandal are enjoined. Clothes and ornaments are to be put on it and flowers and fruit offered. A similar but more elaborate procedure is to be followed for pūjā in the temple The limbs of the image are to be rubbed with a delicate cloth well perfumed and smeared with a paste of sandal. camphor, and saffron. The eight mangalas are to be designed with aksata and pūnā then made to them with five-coloured flowers. Incense is to be burned, and the devotee, if he has the necessary talent, will himself dance before the Jina.4 After the recitation of the pranidhana-sutra he is to make a puspa-grha (flower-house) with fragrant blossoms of many colours, this once again being a symbol of the samavasarana.5 And finally the worshipper plays or gets others to play various musical instruments.6

Probably because of the absence of a rigidly fixed canonical tradition the phija has continued to develop with increasing complexity since the medieval period. Thus the Phija-praharana assigns different types of offerings to different hours of the day: perfumes at dawn, flowers at noon, incense and lamps at eventucle, and requires the marking of the image with no less than nine tilahas. Phija is to be made in the padmäzana posture with downcast eyes and in silence; the worshipper should face the west and if he fails to observe this rule various ills such as poverty will befall him.§

The Acāropadeśa gives details of the pūjā very similar to those of the Pūjā-prakaraṇa. Tilakas are to be made on the forehead,

```
1 SrDK 66 2 Kirfel, op. cit., pp 153-5. 3 SrDK 23-26

• SrDK 57-70. 2 SrDK 71-73. • SrDK 74-75
```

&lt;sup>7</sup> Pūjā-prakarana, 8-10, AU 11 29-30. <sup>8</sup> Pūjā-prakaraņa, 4-6.

chest, neck, and abdomen of the image. Flowers are never to be cut in two as pāpa would be provoked by the severing of leaves or flowers, there being a special objection to splitting the buds of campaha flowers.\text{!} A sevenfold purity—of mind, body, speech, dress, ground, utensils, and ritual—is to be observed before the pijā can be made.\text{!}

Whilst the Svetāmbaras tend to augment continually the lists of possible forms of pūjā the later Digambaras develop the pūjā in other directions. Vāmadeva, for example, mentions as a requisite a triple ablution: vorda-snāna (purification by observance of the vows) and mantra-nāna (purification by recitation of mantra) as well as the ritual bathing of the body (kāyu-snāna). Again, after asperging the image the votary is to pour the remains of the scented abhinbar water on his own head.

Dharmakirtı, ın hıs Sanghācāra commentary on the Caitya-vandana-bhāŋya,' explams the anga-piŋā as comprısang the pıckung up and sweeping away of the remains of the offerings and the faded garlands, the washing of the body of the image, the garlanding, bathing, and inunction, the marking of the titāka, the adorning with jewels, the burning of incense, and the placing in the hand of the image of a coconut, betch lut, nāgwalli leaf, or similar offering.

The agra-pūjā, the putting before the image of amışa—literally 'meat' but defined in the dictionaries as 'anything comestible'—includes narvedya, betel, fruits, leaves, sugar-cane, and lamps.

Another late writer, Ratnaśekhara, is interesting for his development of the details of the pūjā. He too insists that the worshipper should, in the inner sanctuary, meditate on the Jina seated in the samavasarana and should also visualize the whole temple as the samavasarana. He is particularly concerned with the disposal of the nirmālya by which is meant anything put on or before a Jina image—akitata, fruits, sweet cakes, flowers, clothes—that has become devoid of lustre, perfume, or freshness. As in the ramy season the nirmālya will contain insects it is to be discarded, together with the water that has been used for bathing the image, in a spot where people do not tread.

As already explained the anga-pūjā commences by the removal of the nirmālya, the wiping and washing of the limbs, and the brushing of the hair. After the offering of flowers the image is

&lt;sup>1</sup> ÄU ii. 29-31.
<sup>2</sup> ÄU ii. 12.
<sup>3</sup> BhS (V) 470.
<sup>4</sup> CVBh 10.
<sup>6</sup> Śrāddhd-vidhi, p. 53a.

hathed with the pañāmntal—ghee, curds, milk, water, and sugarcane juice—and then with sterile (prāsuka) water. The limbs are next to be rubbed with a scented cloth which must be soft in texture and red in colour and then anointed with go-sirra sandal. In using sandal paste flowers or other forms of anga-pāṇā, care is to be taken that the eyes and mouth of the Jina are not covered. The image is now clothed and adorned with ornaments of gold, pearls, and gems and with gold and silver flower designs. Garlands, crowns, and flower-houses are fashioned with flowers of campaka, ketaka, statepatra, saharapatra, and jait and in the Jina's hand is placed a citron, coconut, betel nut, nāgavalli leaf, sweetmeat, or com [nāṇabala].

The agra-pi\(\tilde{g}\) includes the designing of the eight mangalas with grains of rice or mustard seed or, better still, with grains of gold or silver, the disposing of little heaps of food (the caturevaldahara) in groups of three, the waving of lamps before the image, the offering of nosegays of flowers (\textit{bush-prakava}) The \(\tilde{a}\) interface of flowers (\textit{bush-prakava}) The \(\tilde{a}\) interface and their perfumed substances \(\tilde{a}\).

It is stressed that phili must first be made to the milia-limida, opinicipal image) within the inner sanctuary just as when making guru-eundana the first salutation is for the âiārya and not for those munit who may happen to be nearest. It would be very undesirable, for example, if pujd were first made to the image at the door (deārabimba) only to find that there were not sufficient flowers to make pijd to the principal image. But within the limits of one's means the same ritual is to be followed for all images including those in one's private chapel (grha-cautya). The image is to be well rubbed dry each day to prevent the formation of mould (syāmbā).

In all the texts there is a clear insistence that the variety and richness of the pūjū depend on one's financial means. A poor man will content himself with the simple meditation of the bhāva-pūjū though he may assist others in making offerings by threading garlands of flowers.

3 Ibid., pp. 56 ff

2 Sraddha-vidhi, pp. 53 ff

<sup>1</sup> Compare with this the pañca-ratia (gold, silver, copper, coral, and pearls) and the pañca-garya, both of which enter into the later ritual.

THE ASATANAS

The term as employed in the canonical texts covers any act on the part of a younger monk implying a lack of respect to an older monk. Thirty-three such äditanäs of the vandanaka ritual, listed in the Avadyaka texts, are described by Hemacandra' and Devendra' but are with difficulty applicable! to the layman performing this rite. Others are devised to cater for the replacement of the guru by the sthäpanäcäny, and at some stage the concept of äditana' as transferred to the cartyse-vandana ritual and developed to a point where the word comes virtually to signify a sacrilege or profasarion of the temple. Though the designation seems never to be used by them some Digambara writers' note a number of acts which should be avoided in the presence of an ascetic (no special category is devised for the temple). These, though more general and less ritualistic in character, are in effect identical with the geuro-äditamä.

They are given below, together with the ten deväsatanas of Nemicandra, which becomes the standard later list, and the ten mentioned by Hemacandra and repeated by Āśadhara.

	DIGAMBARA	NEMICANDRA	HEMACANDRA
(1)	yawning (jrmbhana)	sleeping (stapna)	sleeping (nidrā)
	laughter (hāsya)	laughter (hāsa)	laughter (hāsa)
(3)	jesting (narma)	wearing sandals (upānah)	sporting (vilāsa)
(4)	gesticulation (rikāra)	micturating (mûtra)	quarrelling (kalaha)
(5)	spitting (msthivana)	defecting (uccāra)	spitting (nisthyūta)
(6)	making one's toilet (anga- samskāra)	copulation (stri-bhoga)	evil gossip (duskathā)
	lying (asatya)	eating (bhojana)	consuming \ (bhojuna)
(8)	calumnsating (abhyākhyāna)	drinking (pāna)	the ((pana)
(9)	leaning (avastambha)	betel (tambola)	fourfold ((svādima)
(10)	clapping the hands (kara- tādana)	dicing (dyūta)	aliments J(khādima)

- (11) stretching the hands (kara-sphota)
- (12) stretching the feet (pāda-prasārana)
  (13) stretching the body (gātra-bhañjana)

Reference is made to profanations of the temple (vajjeyavvam tu taya dehamm vi kanduyana-m-āi) as early as the Pūjā-vidhāna-pañcāšakas though the term āšātanā is not there used. Abhavadeva

YS in 130 (pp. 676-7)
 Hemacandra's remark that 'in the descriptions of the vandanaka the celebrant is a monk not a layman' (p. 679) suggests that he was aware of this.
 Sr (A) XIII 40-41.
 PS 432
 YS in. 81.

* Sr (A) xiii 40-41. 5 PS 432 * SDhA vi. 14. 8 P (Pūjā).

explains the phrase quoted as referring not only to scratching an itching sore, but to spitting, stretching the limbs, and talking idly. Nemicandra, who gives the ten deväädanäa enumerated above, also sets out a longer list of eighty-four.\times embraces some very disparate elements of which one or two may perhaps be the result of textual corruptions for the Prakrit text is, as so often in such enumerations, very unsatisfactory; in any event it includes the ten mentioned above together with a number which are based on infringements of the five abhugamas of the catya-vandana ritual. As a curnosity rather than for its practical importance it is given below:

- (1) khela-spitting
- (2) kelt-pastimes
- (3) kalt-wrangling
- (4) kalā-practising arts such as bowmanship
- (5) kulalaya-rinsing the mouth (comm. gandūsa)
- (6) tambola—chewing betel
- (7) udgālana-spitting out betel
- (8) gāli-vulgar abuse
- (9) kangulikā-micturation and defecation
- (10) sarīra-dhāvana-cleansing the body
- (11) keśa-arranging the hair
- (12) nakha—paring the nails
  (13) lohita—letting blood drip from cuts or sores
- (14) bhaktosa-eating at onc's case
- (15) tvac-picking off the scab from a sore
- (16) pitta-vomiting bile
- (17) vānta—vomiting
- (18) daśana—cleaning the teeth
  (19) viśrāmanā—massaging the body
- (19) taraman—massaging the body
   (20) dāmana—tethering of animals (another explanation is 'breaking in of horses')

(21) danta— (22) aksi— (23) nakha— (24) ganda—	letting discharges or secretions	teeth eye nails boil
(25) nāsīkā— (26) sīras—	of these organs or excrescences fall on the floor of the temple	nose head
(27) śrotra— (28) chavi—		ear skin

&lt;sup>1</sup> PS 433-6.

- (20) mantra—use of mantras
- (30) milana-meeting old men to discuss marriage contracts
- (31) lekhyaka-business transactions
- (32) vibhajana-settlement of inheritances
- (33) bhandara-storing of property
- (34) dustāsana—sitting with one leg crossed over the other
- (35) chāṇi-making pats of cowdung
- (36) karpata- ) (37) dālı— | concealing these and other
- (38) parpata— commodities in the temple to escape taxation
- (40) nāśana-taking refuge in the temple to evade justice
- (41) äki anda-wailing, lamentation
- (42) v1-kathā-idle gossip (or perhaps more specifically the vn-kathās)
- (43) sara-ghatana-fabrication of bows and arrows
- (44) trryak-samsthāpana-stabling of animals
- (45) agmi-sevana—kindling fires
- (46) randhana-cooking
- (47) pariksana—testing of coins
- (48) naisedhiki-bhamana-failure to observe the naisedhiki
- (49) chattra—
- (52) santra— (51) santra— (52) cāmara— (52) cāmara— (53) cāmara— (54) cāmara— (55) cāmara— (56) cāmara— (57) cāmara— (58) cāmara— (58) cāmara— (59) cāmara— (59) cāmara— (59) cāmara— (59) cāmara—
- (53) mano-'nekatva-failure to concentrate one's mind
- (54) abhyangana-inunction of the body with oil
- (55) sacittānām atvāra—failure to remove sentient objects such as flowers
- (56) ajive tyāga-removal of non-sentient objects such as neck-
- (57) drstau no-anjali-failure to make the anjali on sight of the Ima image
- (58) eka-sätottaräsanga-bhanga—failure to put on an outer garment
- (59) mukuta-wearing a diadem on one's head
- (60) mauli-wearing a tiara on one's head
- (61) sirah-sekhara-wearing a wreath of flowers on one's head
- (62) hudda-making wagers

- (63) kanduka-geddikādi-ramana-playing with a ball and stick
- (64) jyotkāra-burning lamps for the spirits of the ancestors
- (65) bhanda-kriyā-making indecent remarks
- (66) re-kāra—making contemptuous remarks
- (67) dharana—restraining wrongdoers
- (68) rana-fighting
- (69) vālānām vivaraņa-combing one's hair
- (70) parvastikā-spreading one's bed
- (71) pādukā—keeping on one's sandals
- (72) pāda-prasārana-stretching out one's feet
- (73) puta-puti-whistling
- (74) panka-making the floor muddy by washing one's body
- (75) rajas-making the floor dusty by shaking one's feet
- (76) marthuna-copulation
- (77) yūka-removing lice from the head
- (78) jemana-eating
- (79) guhya—not covering the sexual organs (there is a v l. yuddha—wrestling)
  - (80) vaidya—practising medicine
  - (81) vānijva-buying and selling
  - (82) śavyā—sleeping on a bed
  - (83) jala-drinking water or letting it drop
- (84) majjana-bathing

The sanskritizations given above are those of Siddhasena Süri and represent in themselves an interpretation of the original Prakrit. There are slight divergencies in the list given by Devendra' but that of the fifteenth-century Ratnasékhara' tallies completely with the Pracacana-sărodhân a.

It is to Ratnašekhara<sup>3</sup> that we must turn for the full picture of the āšātanās as a category of Janusm. They are classified as follows.

- In respect of jñāna:
- jaghanya, e.g. letting a drop of spittle tall on a manuscript or rosary, pronouncing a syllable too little or too much;
- (u) madhyama, e.g. reciting at the wrong time; touching a book with one's foot out of pramāda, dropping a book on the ground, cating when the jñānopakarana is close at hand;

&lt;sup>1</sup> ŚrDK 123 (p. 270) <sup>3</sup> Ibid , pp. 71*a* fi

<sup>2</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p. 73b.

- (iii) utkrşta, e.g. wiping the characters on manuscripts with spittle; sitting or lying on a manuscript; defecating when the jñānopakurana is close at hand; expressing reprobation of the sacred knowledge and its repositories.
- In respect of deva.
- (i) jaghanya—the list of ten already given;
- (ii) madhyama—a list of forty, which is clearly less original than either the ten or the eighty-four āšātamās and seems to have been constructed from them. in any event it contains no new elements.
- (111) utkrsta-the list of eighty-four given above,
- 3. In respect of the guru.
  - (1) jaghanya-concerned with touching the guru's feet;
- (ii) madhyama—concerned with contact with mucus, spittle, or other impurities,
- (iii) uthrs/a—concerned with acting contrary to the guru's command.

All these are taken from the conventional enumeration of thirtythree āšātanās of the vandanaka.

- 4. In respect of the sthapanacarya.
  - (1) jaghanya, e.g. moving it about, touching it with the feet,
- (ii) madhyama, e.g. letting it fall on the ground, dropping it in contempt,
- (iii) utkṛṣṭa, e.g. destroying it, smashing it to pieces.

The destruction of temple property is said to be also a very serious āśātanā.

PRAMĀDA

PRAMADA (carelessness) or pramatta-yoga (careless activity) is a primary cause of himā. Amṛtacandra dwells on this fundamental concept haid down in the Tatkrātha-sūtra and finds pramatta-yoga, and therefore himā, in asatya and all other transgressions of the moral law. The amartha-danda-vrata, which is largely a reinforcement of the ahimā-vrata, contains a special section devoted to abstinence from activities resulting from pramādācarita. In that connexion pramāda is fivefold:

- (i) drinking alcohol (madya), which is also condemned as an infringement of the mūla-guṇas;
- (ii) sensual pleasures (visaya);
- (iii) the passions (kasāya),
- (iv) sleep (nidrā);

Sleep as a form of pramāda is often mentioned. Like food it should always be enjoyed only in moderation, and according to many texts from the Pañcāsāka¹ onwards one should always in any interval of sleep meditate on the foulness of the human body, for fone realizes that the bodies of women are only outwardly attractive, Kāma's arrows will be but empty feathers. In any event sleep during daytime is to be rigorously eschewed, and at night it is to be restricted to the munimum.

- (v) unprofitable conversation (vi-kathā).
- Four (or sometimes seven) types of vn-kathā or aśubha-kathā are generally listed:
- (1) Talk of women (tti-kathā)—this is understood to mean talking about women's dresses, ornaments, looks, or gait, as, for example, saying that a woman is slender or full-breasted or skilled in love-making or clse that she squawks like a crow and waddles like a buffalo. It may also cover comparisons between women of different countries.
- (ii) Talk of food (bhakta-kathā)—this applies to descriptions of various kinds of dishes or of what one plans to eat at one's next meal such as saying how delicious are cakes made with ghee and honey.
- (iii) Talk of places (deta-kathā)—as examples of this are cited the statements that in the south there is abundant food and desarable women, or in the east wine and sugar and rice and cloth, or that in the north there are brave men, swift horses, abundant saffron, and sweet grapes and pomegranates, wheat being the main crop, whilst in the west there are sugar-cane and cool waters and cloth of fine texture. Saint Sürs suggests rather similar examples: that Gurjara is a land difficult of access, the people of Läpa are great warriors, or that it is pleasant to live in Kashmir.

- (iv) Talk of kings (rāl-kathā)—this would refer to statements such as these: our ruler is very heroic or the king of Gauda has many elephants; or again, that there was a terrible battle between two neighbouring kings.
- (v) Sentimental talk (mṛdu-kāruṇikā kathā)—this is defined as tales calculated to soften the hearts of the auditors such as descriptions of persons in misfortune separated from their loved ones.
- (v) Irreligious talk (dariana-bhednii kathā)—this term would apply to discourses destructive of right belief such as praise of, for example, Buddhist doctrines by people who imagine themselves to be very knowledgeable. It is practically equivalent to the parapäsand-praciamā atričar of samyaktea.
- (vii) Unethical talk (cāritra-bhedini kathā)—by this is meant stories in which the repeated transgressions of moral precepts can offer a bad example to those who listen to them.

These seven vv-kathās are listed by Śānti Sūri<sup>1</sup> in the Dharma-ratna-prakarana but in general, as, for example, by Hemacandra<sup>2</sup> only the first four are taken into account.

Just as pramāda finds expression in idle speech so can it be avoided by silence. Amitagati³ recommends the undertaking of a vow of silence (mauna-evata) which may be either for a limited period or for one's life long. In the former case its completion will be marked by a festival in the temple with the dedication of a bell (ghaṇthā), any such offering made in celebration of a successfully accomplished vow, being styled an uddyotana or, more commonly, an udyöpana.

The maintenance of silence is regarded as essential for auspicious meditation (fukla-dhyāna) and for the āradyakas as the list of the mainas or occasions for silence shows. Amitagati notes four of these: eating, excretion, pāpa-kārya, and āradyaka, but at least from Āsādhara onwards afigure of seven is fixed, the actual enumeration varying slightly from author to author. Here are some examples.

ÄŚÄDHARA* MEDHĀVIN³ CĀRITRASUNDARA*

(1) bhojana bhojana bhojana

(2) maithuna maithuna maithuna

(2) maithuna maithuna maith (3) snána snána snána

DhRP 20.
 Sr (A) XII 108-10. Aiáidhara here clearly borrowed from Amutagati (SDhA iv. 36-37)
 SDhA Iv. 38.
 Sr (M) vi. 44
 AU 151.

ÄŚĀDHARA MEDHĀVIN CĀRITRASUNDARA
(4) mala-kṣepa hadana viḍ-utsarga
(5) vāmana mūtruna vamana
(6) pāpa-kārya‡ pūjā danta-dhāvana modhu maraka ayayaka mrodhu

The term nirodha is a little unclear: if it means the 'stoppage of breath' in yogic exercises conducing to meditation the Svetāmbara list of Cāritasundara will be parallel with the Digambara lists: in both cases the Jana notion of religious rites will have been appended to an enumeration of physical activities—eating, copulation, bathing, vomiting, excretion, tooth-cleaning—regarded by the primitive mind as exposing the individual to danger from the unseen.

THE YATRA

Devendra, in the  $\hat{S}r\bar{a}ddha$ -dina-krtya,<sup>2</sup> classifies the  $y\bar{a}tr\bar{a}$  into three types representing in fact different concepts, the last of which has little in common with the others but the name.

- (1) asfāhnika-vātrā—the festival of the Nandiśvara-parvan;
- (2) ratha-yātrā—the processions in which the sacred images are carried through the streets;
- (3) tīrtha-yātrā--pilgrimages to holy places.

This threefold division is not, it would seem, found earlier— Hemacandra, for example, does not deal with the subject in the Yoga-datra, though he describes a ratha-yatrā in detail in the Pariitja-parvam—but it is repeated by Ratnaśekhara in the Śrād-dha-rulh.<sup>3</sup>

- 1. The astālmika-yātrā takes place in Nandišvara-parvan from satamī to paurnimā in the bright fortnights of the months of Kārtuka, Phālguna, and Āṣādha. This act of worship—one of the forms of pājā listed by Jinasena*—as a surrogate for the adoration of the Jina images by the gods in the temples of the Nandišvara-dvipa, which is inaccessible to mortals. It would appear to be the only festival of the Jaina calendar to which the older śrāvakācāras devote any attention.
  - Pāpa-kārya is explained by Āśādhara himself as actions involving ārambha.
     ŚrDK 202 (pt. ii. pp. 206-8)
  - <sup>3</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, p 163b. <sup>4</sup> MP xxxviii. 26.

2. The ratha-vatra, in Devendra's brief description, is essentially a chariot festival; the Jina images are paraded through the streets on a flower-decorated chariot with white chattras, camaras, and pennants to the accompaniment of musical instruments and the dancing of men and women. It is not clear from the texts whether there is any essential difference between this and the preceding vātrā. Both probably combine the same elements and the Yātrāpañcāsaka2 in fact speaks only of a "ina-vātrā-laina, that is, and not Hindu-though Abhavadeva, commenting the Stava-ridhapañcāśaka,3 defines the word vātrā as astāhnika-mahimā pūrā ca. Probably the astāhmka festival offered a model for other popular celebrations in which profane spectacles like dancing and drama could, like folk-tales, be given a nihil obstat when adapted to religious ends. It is the kalyanas of the Jinas, particularly of the last Jina, Mahavira, that are held to be the most suitable times for the carrying out of vatras.

These kalyāṇas, * so-called, according to the Pañcāsaka, * because they bring benefit (kalyāṇa) to living beings, are generally four or five in number, though there are some divergencies in the listing of them

Pañcāśaka <sup>6</sup> and Digambaras	Vasunandin	HEMACANDRA, Devendra	JINAPRABHA <sup>7</sup>
<ol> <li>gurbhādhāna</li> <li>janma</li> </ol>	janma niskramana	janma dîkşû	cyavana garbhāpahāra
(3) nışkramana	jňána	jñāna	janma
(4) jñāna	tirtha-cihna	nırvâna	dikşi
(5) nirvāna	nirvāna		เกิลักง

About birth, renunciation of the world, attainment of illumnation, and final release there is little dispute; but the notation of the garbhāpahāra (removal from the womb), which mirrors faithfully the Kalpa-sūtra story, seems to be rather unusual; of course cyavaraa corresponds to garbhādhāna (conception).

The early date of the Pañcāśaka makes its description of a yātrā8 of great value and worth quoting in extenso.

- <sup>1</sup> ŚrDK, pt 11, p. 206. <sup>2</sup> P (Yātrā) 3.
- Stava-vidhi-pañcāšaka, 3
- <sup>3</sup> Stava-vudn-pañcāšaha, 3
  <sup>4</sup> Ašādhara wrote a short work, the Kalyānā-mala, in which the calendar of these festivals for the twenty-four firthankara: is versified. Hernacandra lists the

The yātrā, as an external manifestation of the importance and material prospertry of those who profess the Jaina religion, is a form of prabhāvanā which again is one of the constituent elements or angas of samyaktva or right belief. Its proper accomplishment is achieved by the combination of the following factors:

- (i) dāna—the distribution of largesse. This includes not only almsgiving to monks but charity to the needy without distinction of creed or calling—even 'killers' such as fishermen are to share in it. It should mark the commencement of the vārā.
- (ii) tapas—austerities which in practice mean food restrictions (ekāšana-pratyākhyāna is cited as an example). The purpose is to emphasize the solemnity of the occasion and to induce a proper frame of mind in the participants.
- (III) sarira-satkāra bodily adornment. People are to wear their best clothes and to use the best unguents and garlands.
- (iv) gita-vādītra—music and song These should be pleasing, fitting for the occasion, and calculated to inspire a religious frame of mind.
- (v) tuti-stotra—hymns of praise. These should not be merely sonorous but of deep significance and should tend to generate a desire to seek release from the world. They are also to be sama (the commentator explains either this as 'not harsh in sound' or as 'easily understandable').
- (vi) prekunaha—spectacles. These are to be understood as religious dramas (dharma-nātaka) dealing with such themes as the Jina's birth, life, and renunciation of the world and accompanied by displays of dancing. They are to be performed preferably at the beginning of the yātrā.

The culmination of the festival occurs when the Jina image is taken out of the temple and borne in procession on a chariot through the city together with religious pictures; this is the rathayaina properly so-called. All expenditure and efforts for this end are praiseworthy because the moral effect of the yaina contributes to the avoidance of himsa and enables some people to attain to enlightenment.<sup>2</sup>

- 3. The tirtha-yātrā seems to be a later development.3 There is
- P (Yűtrő) 26-28

- <sup>2</sup> Ibid. 18.
- J For a study of Digambara and Svetämbara places of pilgrimage see Premi, op. cit., pp. 185-250.

no indication of its being known to the author of the Pañcāiaka but the custom must have existed in Abhayadeva's time for in his commentary! he is careful to explain that the treatise deals with a festival and not with journeying to another country.

For a description of the tirtha-yātrā as a well-established custom it is necessary to turn to a writer who is later than the limits set for the study. Ratnásékhara² delines the expression as meaning the visiting of such places as Satruñjaya and Raivata where the atmosphere is hallowed by association with the birth, initiation, enlightemment, or mrāma of litthānakras.

The would-be pilgrim to these holy places must observe certain interdictions: he must not take more than one meal a day, he must not wear garlands or other sacrtta objects, he must abstain from sexual relations, he must sleep on the ground, and he should travel on foot even if he possesses horses and carriages or other means of transport. The pilgrimage is naturally envisaged as a communal effort. A man of substance will first seek the authorization of the local ruler, get together a party from among his own household and kinsfolk and co-religionists rather as if he were organizing a merchant caravan, and invite suitable religious preceptors. Then, assembling provisions and baggage animals as well as vehicles for those unable to travel afoot and hiring armed guards for the expedition, he will set out at an auspicious astrological conjuncture after festal būjās in the temples. On the journey he will look after the welfare of the members of the convoy, providing food, betel, and clothes and encouraging the faint-hearted. En route he will hold pūjā services and provide for the restoration of ruined temples in towns and villages. When the place of pilgrimages comes into sight he will distribute alms to his co-religionists. The actual celebrations at the tirtha will include the full eightfold puja, a major būjā with a buspa-grha and kadali-grha, a night wake, a festival of music and dance, and a period of fasting. The party will then return home

Ratnasekhara's description, by its very completeness, attests a long tradition for the tirtha-yatra by his day; and in fact Asidhara advises rich men to organize them in order to spread right beliefs in the world, and refers to their beneficial effect in counteracting the spurious attractions of the Kali age.<sup>4</sup>

&lt;sup>1</sup> P (Yātrā) 4. <sup>2</sup> Śrāddha-vidhi, pp. 164b ff <sup>3</sup> SDhA ii 84 <sup>4</sup> SDhA ii. 27

THE CAITYA

THE term is used to designate both the image and, equivalent to castyālaya, the temple. In the former sense there is an old classification into five types noted by Nemicandra:

- bhakti-cartya—an image set up in the home for devotional purposes and used at the three sandhyās,
- (ii) mangala-caitya—an image set in the middle of the door lintel as an auspicious symbol;
- (iii) mśrā-krta-cartya-an image used by a particular gaccha,
- (iv) amśrā-kṛta-caitya-an image common to all gacchas,
- (v) šāšvata-caitya—an uncreate image existing since all eternity in some temple in the three worlds.

Hemacandra* notes the first, second, and fifth types of these. He also advocates the construction of temples, the restoration of derict ones, and the rebuilding of ruined ones. As in similar activities of a pious nature any injury to living beings caused by the work of excavation and construction is outweighed by the good done in promoting the cause of religion

Devendra3 has a slightly different classification:

- bhakti-castya—an image or temple for devotional purposes;
  - (a) ansirā-krta—without lodging for monks as at Astāpada,
     (b) mirā-krta—with lodging for monks.
- (11) mangala-cartya-as at Mathurā;
- (III) śāśvata-cartya—as in Nandīśvara-dvīpa;
- (iv) sādharmika-caitya-an image for the use of co-religionists.

The temple, says Åšádhara, destroys the spurnous attraction of the present age and provides an āšama for sacetics where the laity can rid themselves of the worldly life through contact with religious ceremonies 'Attached to the temple there should be a garden with a water-supply and a lotus pool to provide offerings for the phigā. Food-distribution centres (sattra) and medical-treatment centres (chitak-ādijā) should also be set up.'

Devendra has a series of verses in praise of those who rebuild or restore runned Jaina temples, they will enjoy the esteem of their fellow men and will be reborn, if not as devas at least in an exalted family on earth. Knowledge and artistic skill and intelligence, if

```
<sup>1</sup> PS 659.
<sup>2</sup> YS 191. 120 (p 585)
<sup>3</sup> SrDK 151.
<sup>4</sup> SDhA 11 37.
<sup>1</sup> Ibid. 40.
```

they are to be worth while, must be used in the service of the Jna.! If, on the other hand, any man appropriates or allows others to appropriate religious property (Jina-dravya) he will experience misfortunes of every kind in the cycle of transmigration, so hould take a vow never to touch it. Temple property comprises valuables such as gold and silver and also the actual construction material—bricks, stone, and timber.² Grouped together within the same aura of untouchability are the monastic property, i.e. the clothes, begging bowls, and other objects used by monks (guru-dravya), the learned property or books (jiāna-dravya); and all that has been bequeathed to the community 'to sow on the seven fields or kerta' (sidhārana-dravya) or prabhāray or prabhāray

SVÄDHYÄYA

St. ADITAY: (study), regarded as one of the six forms of internal tapas and by the Digambaras as one of the six daily karmans' of the householder, is a feature of the lay life that has been transferred directly from the textbooks of monastic discipline. It is traditionally divided into five elements.

- vācanā—reciting of the sacred texts;
- (11) prasna-asking the guru questions about them;
- (iii) parwartanā—repetition of the texts in order not to forget those previously learned;
- (iv) anupreksā5-imbuing oneself with the meaning,
- (v) dharma-kathā—listening to the exposition of religious parables.

Without the light that comes from study it is impossible, says Amtagati, b or id oneself of the darkness of ignorance. For Vāmadeva? raūdhyāya is one of the four amuogan propounded by the Jina. Ašādhara* recommends the construction of raūdhyāya-alāta since 'where there is no opportunity of study the minds of monks, tossed about by an inconstant wind, walk not in primacy in the doctrines of religion'.

- 1 SrDK 00-110 2 SrDK 126-30 3 CS. p. 21
- 4 Śr (A) xiii 81, T (P) ix 25. See Schubring, Die Lehre der Jamas, p. 169. Here the word amprekjä has a rather special meaning. See A. N. Upathyse, Introduction to KA, pp. 7-8. The other four elements of xidhydya are some-

Introduction to KA, pp 7-8 The other four elements of widdhydya are some times considered as supports (âlambana) of dharmya-dhydna to which four anuprekpās are then assigned Sf(A) xiii 83 7 BhS(V) 599

8 SDhA 11. 39

TAPAS

THIS term would seem to embrace any form of self-discipline or training for the spiritual life. By the Digambaras it is accounted the sixth of the daily karmans and by both Digambaras and Svetāmbaras is held to be either external (bahva) or internal (abhvantara). The six varieties of the latter are:1

- (1) Confession to a guru (prāyaścitta); this includes pratibramana and alocana
- (2) Expression of respect to ascetics (vinava)
- (3) Rendering of personal services to ascetic (vaivāvrtīva).
- (4) Studying, memorizing and expounding, the sacred lore (svādhyāva).
- (5) Abandonment of the body (utsarga, vyavasarga)
- (6) Meditation (dhyana), i.e. concentration on one thought for up to a maximum time of one muhūrta.

There is some confusion in this list. Svādliyāva is also of its own right the fourth of the six daily karmans, and vinaya and varyavritya together make up bhakts, which is one of the five bhusanas of samyaktva.2 The term varyāvrtiya-vrata is also used by some writers as a synonym of dana-vrata,

- The six varieties of bahva-tabas are:3
- (1) Fasting (anasana).
- (2) Taking only part of a full meal (unaudarya, avamaudarya).
- (3) Limiting of food according to the range of choice or according to the time, place, and posture in which it is offered (vrtti-samksepa, vrtteh sankhva).
  - (4) Abstention from luxury toods (rasa-parityāga).
- (5) Avoidance of all that can lead to temptation (samlinata, vrvrkta-śavyāsana).
- (6) Mortification of the flesh (kāya-kleia), e.g. by heat, cold, insect bites. The first four of these are variants of fasting and go together with others mentioned in the sections on pratyākhyāna and posadhopavāsa-vrata Bāhya-tapas is virtually synonymous with fasting, even the expression kāya-kleša being used in that
  - PASU 199, SrDK, pt 11, p 76 See Schubring, op. cit, pp 196-7.
  - 3 PASU 198, SrDK, pt 11, p 76 See Schubring, op. cit., p 196

TAPAS

230 sense by Vasunandin. In fact asceticism for the Jaina lies first and foremost in depriving oneself of food, its extreme expression being found in sallekhanā.

DHYÄNA

DHYANA. one of the forms of abhyantara-tapas is defined in the Tattrārtha-sūtra¹ as 'the concentration of thought on a single object for up to one muhūrta¹. It may be of four types, the first and second being inauspicious (aprasasta) and the third and fourth auspicious (praisasta) and each type is again subdivided to cover four possible themes:

- 1. Painful (ārta).
- (a) contact with what is unpleasant (amanoŋña-samprayoga) and desire for its removal. 'What is unpleasant' would cover hostile persons, material discomforts, hurtful words, and disagreeable emotions;
- (b) separation from what is pleasant (manojña-enyoga), for example, through losing one's loved ones or one's wealth, and desire to get them back again;
- (c) the sensation of suffering (vedanā) as from an illness and the desire to rid oneself of it;
- (d) hankering for sensual pleasures (nidāna). The same term of course recurs as one of the three śalyas and as an aticāra of the sallekhanā-vrata.
- Harmful (raudra):
- (a) the infliction of hurt (himsā);
- (b) falsehood (anrta);(c) theft (steva),
- (d) the hoarding of wealth (dhana-samrakşana).5
- 1. Moral (dharmya):
- (a) discerning the command of the Jina (ājñā-vicaya);
- (b) discerning the nature of what is calamitous (apāya-vicaya),
- <sup>1</sup> Sr (V) 351. <sup>2</sup> T (P) 18. 27. <sup>3</sup> CS, p. 74, <sup>4</sup> Sr (A) xv. 9-15, T (P) is 28-39.
- <sup>5</sup> Hemscandrs (YS 111 73) covers arta- and raudra-dhyana only, in discussing the sravakācāra.

- (c) discerning the consequences of karma (vipāka-vicaya);
- (d) discerning the structure of the universe (samsthana-vicava).
- Refulgent (śukla).
- (a) consideration of diversity (brthaktva-vitarka);
- (b) consideration of unity (ekatva-vitarka);
- (c) maintenance of subtle activity (sūksma-krīvā-pratīpāti);
- (d) complete destruction of activity (vvuparata-krivā-nivartini).

Together ārta-dhvāna and raudra-dhvāna constitute abadhvāna. which is one of the manifestations of anartha-danda. Strictly they should apply only to the lay life since a monk who gives way, for example, to raudra-dhvāna has already lapsed from his vocation,2 The other forms of dhyana are proper for an ascetic and śukladhyana is in fact only possible for one who has reached a very high stage of spiritual development. For this reason doubtless some writers such as Camundaraya, and Asadhara treat the whole subject as belonging to the vaty-ūcāra.

Amitagati4 gives to the topic of dhyana a theoretical treatment parallel to that of dana. Four aspects are considered.

- the meditator (dhyātr), who must be pure in heart;
- (ii) the object of meditation (dhyeva):
- (iii) the technique (vidhi):
- (iv) the result obtained (phala), which is svarga or moksa

Camundarayas has a rather similar classification.

It is only the second of these aspects that is of any practical significance, four objects of dhyana being distinguished under this head:6

- (i) meditation on the syllables of the sacred mantras (pada-
- (ii) meditation on the group of magic powers possessed by the Jina (pinda-stha);
- (iii) meditation on the form of the Jina materialized in the statue (rūpa-stha),
- (iv) meditation on the Jina as a disembodied arhat (rūpātita).
- There is a special association of svådhyäya with the dharmya-dhyänä. See p. 237. 2 T (P) × 35

CS, p 74

<sup>4</sup> Sr (A) xv 23

Reduced to a triad by the omission of the third type of meditation, this enumeration finds a place in the conventional cairya-cundana ritual of the Svetämbaras under the designation of the avanthā-trhka and again in the Digambara ritual with Somadeva¹ and Vasunandin.²

VINAYA AND VAIYÄVRTTYA

BOTH of these are classed as forms of abhyantara-tapas, and both relate initially to the monastic life. They may also be viewed as the twin manifestations of that devotion (blakti) to the sacred doctrine which is listed by Hemacandra as one of the bhūsanas of samyaktea.\(^1\)

Vinaya, originally the outward expression of respect for a hierarchical superior, is divided by Vasunandin<sup>4</sup>—and, in his section on yaty-ācāra, by Cāmuṇdarāya<sup>5</sup>—into five categories following the Tatteārtha-sūtra<sup>6</sup> (which has four).

- respect for right belief (dariana-vinaya) expressed by fulfilling the gunas of samyaktva;
- (ii) respect for right knowledge (jñāna-vinaya) and for those who are its repositories;
- (III) respect for right conduct (cāritra-vinaya);
- (iv) respect for ascetic practices (tapo-vinaya);
- (v) respect expressed, for example, to a guru by considerate attentions (upacāra-vmaya), which may take the form of a favourable mental attitude, of courteous words, or of appropriate actions. This last aspect—the kāya-vinaya—includes a number of features which have been given a numerical classification by Hemacandra' as the eightfold upacāra-vudhi; for the most part these are also mentioned by Vasunandin and Cāmuṇ-darāva:
  - (a) rising from one's place (abhyutthāna);
  - (b) going towards him (abhiyāna);
  - (c) making the añjali (añjali-karana);
  - (d) oneself offering him a seat (svayam āsana-dhaukana);
    - (e) acceptance by him of the seat (āsanābhıgraha);
    - <sup>1</sup> Handiqui, pp. 272–82. <sup>3</sup> YŚ ii. 16 <sup>4</sup> Śr (V) 320 <sup>2</sup> Śr (V), 458–76 <sup>5</sup> CS, pp. 65–66 <sup>7</sup> YŚ ii. 16 (p. 185).

- (f) reverent salutation (vandanā);
- (g) waiting upon him (paryupāsana),
- (h) accompanying him as he leaves (anugamana).

Vasunandin' also here includes some actions which might more properly be described as forms of tanyāwritya, such as massaging the limbs and preparing a bed. The upacāra-runaya just described (another form of which is to be found in the nine punyae' perserbied for welcoming an atthin to whom dāma is given) is applicable when a guru is present, but similar respect may be shown when he is absent by mental reverence and words of praise

Like the eundanaha ritual (itself an expression of runaya) winaya wisaya wisaya wisaya sendered by monk to monk or by layman to monk. Vasunandin, however, goes a step further by laying down that laymen may fittingly make käya-vinaya both to ascetics and to laymen.

A similar development, far more important in its implications, has also occurred with the practice of varyhertyle, which is the term used in the canonical texts for bodily services rendered to monks, in particular attendance on the sick. The traditional enumeration of the objects of varyhertyles as worth noting:

- (1) ācārya—the head of a community;
- (2) upādhyāya—a preceptor;
- (3) tapasvm—monk engaged in fasting or other austerities;
- (4) śaiksa, śikṣaka—neophyte,
- (5) glāna—a sick monk,
- (6) gana—a group of monks senior not in age but in religious knowledge;
- (7) kula—a group of monks with the same ācārya;
- (8) sangha-the community of monks,
- (9) sādhu—a monk of long standing:
- (10) samanojña -a distinguished or highly respected monk.

Amitagatis has introduced certain variations into this list: the siddin figures as a voldila (aged monk) and kula and samanojña disappear to make way for pravartaka and gana-raksa, which appear to indicate special types of ācārya. He particularly enjoins the practice of vanyārvītya in times of famine or epidemic disease or when the monks are harassed by parisakas or by threves or rulers.

From this list it is clear that the scope of varyāvṛtīya covers all reciprocal assistance within the community of monks and is not confined to services rendered by an inferior to a superior. It also includes services rendered by laymen (for whom this represents a privilege) to multividual ascetics or to the community of monks: the concept is that expressed by the word yatı-exirāmanā. It is probably the term sangha interpreted already by Siddhasena Gaṇin² as the catur-caraa-xangha (the fourfold community of monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen) that is at the origin of a further extension of the meaning which is fully manifest in Vasunandin's description.

For all those, he says, I within the fourfold community who are very young or very old or afflicted by disease or physically exhausted varyārṛthya is to be performed, this will include the massaging of arms, legs, back, and head, asperging, anonting with oil, and application of cooling pastes; if they are dirty the fifth will be removed and whilst their bodies are washed their beds will be cleaned and made ready, and food and drink and medicines will be provided for them. Such actions bring their own reward both in this life and in succeeding lives.

The mention of providing food recalls another aspect of varyaritya that comes to the fore in the Cāritra-sāra. When monks are assailed by diseases, parisahas, or false beliefs (mithyātva) prānika medicaments and food and drink, shelter and bedding, blankets and religious accessories (dhāmmoqakaramā) are to be given them to help to strengthen them in the faith; these amount in fact to almagving, With this in mind it is not difficult to understand that in the Raina-karandas varyāvṛttya is used as a synonym of dara.

The idea of community self-help, implicit in Vasunandin's concept of vai/yartya, more often finds expression with the Kvetāmbaras in the discussion of vaitadya, one of the gunas or angas of amyaktos. All co-religionists, says Devendra, a are to be regarded as dear friends with whom disputes and quarrels are unthinkable. He who strikes a fellow Jaina in anger is guilty of an distinan—a sacrilege. Money or effort expended in the interests of one's coreligionists is always well spent whether they belong to one's own country and caste or whether they have come from afar.

At the same time the individual has a duty to look to the moral welfare of his fellows. Those who are lukewarm in their zeal for the performance of religious duties should be stimulated in every possible way, even if encouragements or admonitions meet with a testy answer from the person to whom they are addressed. They are to be prodded with questions such as: 'Why, my friend, did I not see you yesterday in the temple or in the posadha-śālā or at the feet of the sadhu?' in order to save them from the grip of pramada.1

* SrDK 243 2 * CS, p. 67 5

&lt;sup>2</sup> T (S) 1x 24 (p. 257) <sup>5</sup> RK 1v. 21.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Śr (V) 337-40. <sup>6</sup> ŚrDK 198-206.

THE ANUPREKSAS

THE subject of the twelve anutreksas2 or themes of meditation has already been treated in many works on Jainism and it would be otiose to discuss it here,3 though certain writers on śrāvakācāra cover the topic. These are mainly Digambaras-Kundakunda, Kārttikeva, Somadeva, Amitagati, 4 Āśādhara, 5 Cāmundarāya 5-but Svetambara works dealing with the subject as an aspect of monastic discipline include the Yora-śāstra o These apply to the anupreksās the designation bhavana (not to be confused with the twenty-five bhāvanās of the mahā-vratas nor with the sixteen Digambara bhāvanās). Here, for the purpose of comparison, are the twelve anubreksās.

- on impermanence (anitya):
- (2) on helplessness (asarana).
- (3) on the cycle of transmigration (samsāra);
- (4) on solitariness (ekatva);
- (5) on the separateness of the self and the body (anyatva). (6) on the foulness of the body (asucva):
- (7) on the influx of karma (asrava).
- (8) on the checking of karma (samvara);
- (a) on the elimination of karma (niriara);
- (10) on the universe (loka):
- (II) on the difficulty of enlightenment (bodhs-durlabha);
- (12) on the preaching of the sacred law (dharma-sväkhvätatva). 1 SrDK 207-19.
- <sup>2</sup> For the canonical origins of the anupreksās see Schubring, op cit
- For a comprehensive treatment of the meditations see K. K. Handiqui, Yasastılaka and Indian Culture (chap x1. "The anupreksas and Jama religious poetry'), and A N Upadhye, Introduction to KA, pp 6-42 Sr (A) xiv.

<sup>5</sup> The anupreksäs are treated both by Cämundaräya (CS, pp. 78-92) and Aśadhara (Anagāra-dharmāmrta, v. 57-82) as a feature of yaty-ācāra.

6 YS IV. 55-110.

THE BHAVANAS

BHAVANA—'meditation' or 'contemplation'—is the designation more commonly used by the Svetāmbaras for the anuprekṣās, Some Digambaras, however, apply this name to another series of mental attitudes, sixteen, not twelve, in number. Here is the list of their themes as given by Cāmundarāya.\(^1\)

- (1) purity of belief (darśana-śuddhi);
- (2) perfection of vinaya (vinaya-sampannată),
- (3) faultless observance of the vratas and the silas (silavratesv anaticara). Sila here signifies the avoidance of anger and similar virtues;
- (4) continuous cultivation of knowledge (abhiksna-jñānopayoga);
- (5) fear of the cycle of reincarnation and its vicissitudes (samvega),
- (6) the practice of the fourfold dāna within the limits of one's power (śaktītas tyāga),
- (7) the practice of austerities within the limit of one's power (iaktitas tapas). The body is vile but may yet be used as a vehicle for spiritual progress;
- (8) removing impediments to the practice of austerities by monks (sādhu-samādhi). This is compared to the extinguishing of a fire that threatens a storehouse:
- (9) the tending of ascetics in misfortune (vaiyāvṛttya-karaṇa);
- (10) devotion to the Jinas (arhad-bhakti),
- (11) devotion to the gurus (guru-bhakti);
- (12) devotion to those learned in holy writ (bahu-śruta-bhakti);
- (13) devotion to the sacred doctrine (pravacana-bhakti);
- (14) zealous performance of the six necessary duties (āvasyakā-parihāni);
- (15) glorification of the sacred doctrine (mārga-prabhāvanā) by tapas, jñāna, and pūjā;
- (16) affection towards the expounders, i.e. exemplary ascetics

I CS. DD 24-27.

&lt;sup>2</sup> One would expect the word fila here to mean the guna-vratas and filta-vratas but Câmundarāya himself explains it as 'the avoidance of anger, &c. in order to keep the vratas' (CS, p 25).

and laymen' (pravacana-vātsalya). (The alternative explanation of this bhāvanā: 'affection for the sacred doctrine' seems too nearly a repetition of pravacana-bhakti to be tenable.)

These bhāwanās though they are mentioned both by Āśādharaand by Medhāwnā as types of meditation are in fact totally distincfrom the amyerkās.* They have rather the nature of those bhāwanās which are designed to fortify the mahā-eratas, that is they are observances to be followed in order to achieve progress in the supritual life.

They represent in fact a transcription of the passage of the Tatteartha-sitra's which lists the asrawas which bring about the auspicious firthankara-nāma-karman, and which Pūjyapāda, in his commentary, terms the sixteen bhāvanās.

THE KALAS

THE seventy-two arts or accomplishments of men belong to the canonical literature and scarcely survive, save as an archaism, in the medieval standardian. But Develorder's seems to be alone in listing them in full, though Vasunandin' ascribes to the inhabitants of the bhoga-bhitims the knowledge of the seventy-two kalās and to their womenfolk the acquaintance with the sixty-four gunas.

In view of the abundant literature on the subject it is pointless to detail them here.8

- Pujyapāda explains as 'co-religionists'
- 2 SDhA vn. 55.
- 3 Sr (M) x 100
- 4 The anuprekşäs are treated by Cämundaräya under the head of yaty-ăcăra (CS, pp 78-92) and considered to be an aspect of dharmya-dhyāna.
  - 5 T (P) vs 24
  - 6 SrDK 106 (pt 1, pp 265-6).
  - 7 Sr (V) 261
- For a full description of the seventy-two kalāi and a comparison with the last of sixty-four in the Kāma-sūtra, see, for example, the article by Amulyachandra Sen in the Calcutta Review, March 1933, pp. 364 ff.

THE SEVEN VYASANAS

THESE are listed as:

- dicing, gambling (dyūta);
- (2) boozing, drinking alcohol (madva, surā):
- (3) meat-eating (māmsa).
- (4) whoring (vesyā);
- (5) hunting (kheta, pāparddhi, mrgayā);
- (6) thieving (caurva, stena):
- (7) adultery (para-dăra).

By definition these vices are specific forms of baba which entail an evil reincarnation (durgati), generally in hell. In fact some later writers assign each vyasana to a special naraka.2 Amitagati3 opposes the seven vices to an integral concept of sila+ (the maintenance of all vows assumed) to which they form an impediment.

As a category the gyasanas are treated only in the Digambara śrāvakācāras, being expressly mentioned by Vasunandin, 5 Aśadhara,6 and Padmanandin (and by Medhāvin, Sakalakīrti, and Siyakoti). Without employing this designation, Amitagati7 covers the same subject in detail. The oldest discussion, of the topic is therefore not earlier than the eleventh century though reference is made to the vvasanas in kathās, both Svetāmbara and Digambara, before that date. There is considerable irregularity of treatment in the literature because thicking is already condemned by the third anuvrata and adultery by the fourth, while eating meat, drinking alcohol, and hunting can all be regarded as violations of ahimsā. Furthermore the Digambara category of the mula-gunas covers the abstention from eating and drinking alcohol and, according to some writers, from gambling,8

It is on the theme of the vyasanas that the moral teaching of Jamism is most clearly sited in a social context; and this morality

- 1 Sr (V) 50
- Praśnottara-śrāvakācāra, xii, Padmanandi-śrāvakācāra, 12.
- 3 Sr (A) xu. 41-53
- . In Digambara texts the word is of course used as a collective name for the guna-tratas and siksā-tratas but it can also be synonymous with brahmacaryā 5 Sr (V) 60-124. 6 SDhA m. 16-23
  - 7 Sr (A) xii. 54-100 and v. 1-26
- Hiralal Jain would like to regard the mention by Jinasena of dyūta in his list of the mula-gunas as an upalaksana for the vyasanas, but this view seems hardly tenable.

is that of the common man who adheres to the conventions of the world, avoiding anything that can evoke obloquy or derision from his neighbours. Even admins is relegated to the background, as, for example, when alcohol is condemned not, as in the earlier texts, because its preparation involves the destruction of life but because intoxication causes a man to act in an indecorous and ridiculous fashion. In some spheres this newer, worldly, morality can lead to contradictions with the older doctrines. Admitting, however reluctantly, a dispensation from perfect chastity for the lay adherent, primitive Jamism forbade him intercourse with all women who where the property of others but allowed him to frequent the woman who was common property—the village prostitute. The inclusion of veiyā under the seven vyusanas represents in effect, therefore, the revocation of an older dispensation

The conventional description of the seven vices is given by Amitagati, Vasunandin, Ašādhara, Gunabhūsana, Sivakoti, and Medhāvin in terms so nearly identical that they must be taken from a common source. Dicing, for example, is said to engender anger, debuson, pride, and greed in their most intense forms. Binded by his infatuation the gambler loses all sense of shame, takes false oaths, and lies so inveterately that even his own mother will not believe him. In a fit of anger he is ready to kill even those nearest to him. So absorbed is he by his vice that he will not head parents or teachers and will even neglect food and sleep.<sup>1</sup>

Meat and alcohol are whits and are given a more extensive treatment from another angle under the heading of the naila-gunas. As a vyasana meat-eating is condemned mainly because it is a concomitant to other vices: in particular it is said to produce an addiction to alcohol, which in itself makes the pursuit of the religious life impossible?

The consequences of drunkenness are realistically portrayed. Under the influence of madya a drinker's intelligence runs away like the wife of a man who has fallen into misfortune. His alcoholic state is manifested in giddiness, lassitude, nausea, trembling fits, red eyes, and unsteadiness of gatt. He tries to commit incest with mother or sister or daughter, and treats his servant as if he were a ruler and his ruler as if he were a servaint. He falls down in a drunken stupor in the highroad or in his courtyard and when the dogs lick his face and urmate in his mouth he imagines in his delusion that he is drinking sweet wine. Thieves remove his clothes as he lies there and when he recovers consciousness he stumbles around drunkenly threatening to kill the man who has robbed him. Then, going home in a daze, he takes his own kin for enemies and smashes his own chattles with a stick By turns he sings, screams, talks slurringly, vomits, tries to dance, gesticulates, uses obscene language, is hilarious, or is plunged in gloom!

The vices of meat-eating and drinking are said to be always found in a harlot whilst her body is polluted by the embraces of the base-born. A man who spends even one night with a prostitute eats the leavings of ordinary workpeople and of outcastes and alient And if he becomes infatuated with her she will wheedle everything out of him and leave him but skin and bones. To every lover she tells the same story—that he is the only man for her. The love of a harlot means only humiliation for a man however high his birth and telenz is

When the vice of hunting is considered, the accent shifts back to alimpa, for this vyasana is said to destroy all compassion. Since a righteous man will not even kill an evidoor if he comes seeking asylum with trna grass between his teeth why should he kill an innocent deer that pastures on grass? If there is sin in the killing of cows and brahmins, there is sin, too, in the killing of other living beings, and as much of it incurred in one day from hunting as in a long veried of time from eating meat and drinking alcohol.<sup>3</sup>

The last two cyasawas differ from the other five in being punishable in a non-Jama society as crimes, so that they not infrequently bring retribution in the present life. Thus the thief who has taken another man's property is presented as apprehensively quitting his home, trembling in every limb, and pursuing a circuitous path, always anxious lest he has been seen. His heart patters and his feet stumble. He is obsessed by fear to the point of being unable to sleep because he has taken away either by force or by deceit the property of others, perhaps even of parents, teachers, and friends, unheedful of his good repute in this world or of what awaits him in the next life. If he is caught by the constables he is at once bound with ropes by a low-caste gailer and promenaded around the streets on the back of an ass with the placard: "This is a thief, and any other caught like him will receive the same retribution." Then

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sr (V) 70-79, Sr (A) v. 1-12.
<sup>2</sup> Sr (V) 88-93; Sr (A) xi. 63-76.
<sup>3</sup> Sr (V) 94-100; Sr (A) xi. 92-100,

C 787

he is quickly carried outside the city where the executioners tear out his eyes or amoutate his limbs or impale him alive.1

Adultery leads to a similar fate. A man who lusts after another's wife and cannot resist his own desires will sigh, weep, sing, beat his head, fall on the ground, and utter incoherent speech,2 Tormented by uncertainty whether the woman will accept his advances he cannot sleep or eat and abandoning family traditions gives way to drink. Sometimes he makes advances and is rebuffed and put out of countenance. If he succeeds in waylaying the woman of his choice and taking her by force against her will what pleasure can he derive? Or if again the woman herself is so lost to shame that she gives herself to him under the impulse of lust what enjoyment will there be in a hurried, furtive union in an empty house or ruined temple? At the slightest sound he will run away and crouch down, looking in all directions, terrified. And if he is discovered and brought before the royal tribunal he will be castrated and then. like a thief, mounted on an ass and paraded through the city before being executed. He can have no reliance even on the woman with whom he is infatuated, for she who betrays her husband will also betray her lover just as a cat that eats its kittens will certainly eat mice.3

The cautionary tales related in connexion with the seven vyasanas are as stereotyped as the descriptions and for that reason are worth a mention. They are amongst the best known in Indian literature. For dvūta the example is Yudhisthira: for madva the Yadavas; for māmsa Bakaraksa; for vešvā Carudatta; for paparddhi Brahmadatta; for caurya Śrībhūti, and for para-dāra Rāvana; while addiction to all seven vices at the same time is personified by Rudradatta.

Āśādhara4 (and following him Medhāvin)5 has conceived of a sub-category of ancillary (sodara) vices, adumbrated rather than systematically set forth under each vyasana:

- (1) dyūta6-gambling for the sake of amusement (presumably for purely nominal stakes) because this can still provoke rāga and dvesa:
- fr (V) 101-11.
- This concurs with the description of love unfulfilled, ranged into a numerical category as quoted by Yasodeva (P (Y)), d category as quoted by 1 27-91.
  3 Sr (V) 112-24, Sr (A) xi 77-91.
  5 Sr (M) v. 164-8.
- 6 SDhA 111. 19.

- (2) madya<sup>1</sup>—eating or drinking anything at all which is the product of fermentation, selling alcohol, sleeping with women who drink alcohol;
- (3) māṃsa²—consuming anything which has been kept in leather containers;
- (4) veśyā<sup>3</sup>—enjoyment of the taurya-trika (vocal and instrumental music and dancing), idle strolling around, associating with pimps and other disreputable company;
- (5) pāparddhi making representations of hunting scenes whether on coins or in books or on cloth;
- (6) cauryas—exploiting the favour of a ruler to take property from a rightful heir, concealing anything which forms part of a joint family property;
- (7) para-dāra6—seducing an unmarried girl: this specifically includes a condemnation of the gandharva-vivāha.

As has been noted the Śvetāmbara irāvakācāras do not treat of the vyasanas as a category though these are mentioned casually at times as in the commentary of the Dharma-ranta-prakarana-Tlow-ever, the same condemnations are of course implicit in their teaching and sometimes Hemacandra's' verses, for example, parallel very closely those of Amttagati or Vasunandin.

THE GATIS

If the ultimate aim of escape from the samsära—mokķa is sometimes called the fifth gati—is not attained when this life is extringuished there are four possibilities of reincarnation: as a human being gagain (māmuya-gati), as an animal (tiryag-gati), as a celestial being (deva-gati), or as a denizen of hell (maraka-gati). There is also what might be called a sub-category of the māmuya-gati: reincarnation in a bhoga-bhūmi, 'a land of case', as distinguished from normal human life, which is passed in a kama-bhūmi, 'a land of toil's'; but in most respects such a farry-tale world is nearer to life in the deva-loka. The tiryag-gata also includes the possibility of reincarnation in the vegetable kingdom as a vanaspati-kāya. This

SDhA 111. 9-11.	2 Ibid. 12.	3 Ibid. 20.
* Ibid. 22	5 Ibid. 21.	6 Ibid. 23.
7 DhRP 7	e g. on madya YS 111. 8-12.	9 T (P) iii. 35

complicated edifice of continuing existence can, it is obvious, respond to the most subtle gradations of merit and dement, but no lasting bliss is possible except through release from it since life, even in the most exalted realms of the deva-loka, will still be tinged with some sadness.

All Jana writers of course stress the retribution that evul acts bring upon themselves either in this life—sometimes directly through the action of the law when they are of a criminal character, sometimes through supernatural intervention, and sometimes through witation by disease and other calamities—or through the automatic operation of karma in another incarnation. The Svetāmbaras have never apparently felt that the discussion of a future life belonged to the sphere of a incubacine, but the Digambaras, particularly the popular writers, deal at considerable length with the subject, giving a standardized, but still vivid, picture of hell and of the bioga-bhāms. While Amptacandra finds in the ideal of moksa the only incentive to a righteous life Vasunandni expressly states that the masses must be coerced by the fear of punishment and the hope of material revard.

Hell' is conceived of as a region immeasurably spacious, divided into seven mansions, each of which, it is sometimes said, 'provides the fitting retribution for one of the seven vyasanas. Mention again is sometimes made of four entries into hell (naraka-dvāra) each wide open to receive the perpetrators of specified evil actions. It is a place of mental as well as physical suffering the capacity for which is never exhausted until the appointed linearnation reaches tac close for the body of a hell-dweller even when cut to pieces by tortures will always be re-created to suffer anew and the mind will always be one to fear.*

In hell a jira becomes spontaneously existent on a surface of ground so rough that he at once gets up only to fall again. Then the demons, whose cannity towards their victims is like that of stake and mongoose, attack him with spears, clubs, tridents, arrows, and swords The Diarma-axisyanae mentions—but the concept is rather an aberrant one—that those who first strike the jiva are the beasts that were aforetime slam by him in offerings to the ancestors

Sr (V) 239.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Jama picture of hell is of course very close to the descriptions given in Buddhist and Hindu texts. See Kane, History of Dharma-fästra, 1v. 167.

Padmanandt-śrāvakācāra, 12
 * Śr (V) 176; Dharma-ratāyana, 71.

 Śr (V) 137.
 " Dharma-ratāyana, 25.

and to bloodthirsty divinities. He is put in a faming pot and as he emerges he is prodded with pukes so that he gnaws his own fingers with the pam; nor do appeals for mercy bring any response from his tormentors. This, according to Vasunandin, is the reward that awats the gambler. 2

Escaping from this torture he rushes into a mountain ravine imagning that he will find a refuge there but now rocks begin to fall on him, smashing his body into tiny fragments. Yet the severed parts at once reunite like drops of quicksilver. If he has consumed honey and alcohol in a former life he is made to drink molten iron and if has eaten udumbara fruits he must swallow live coals.

Next he rushes terrified into a forest only to find that the leaves which fall on him are sharp as swords. With blood streaming from the gashes he seeks to escape but is seized again by the demons, who hold him down and, cutting off lumps of his flesh, force him to swallow them, jeering as they tell him that this meat will be as sweet as that which he at en his human life.<sup>5</sup>

A red-hot ploughshare is forced into his mouth, and to seek relief from the pain he crawls into a river flowing near by, but its waters are corrosive and at the same time full of putrefaction and blood. When he emerges from it he is pounded like sugar-cane in a press and acid is then applied to his wounds and needles forced under his finger-nails. Then the demons constrain him, if he has committed adultery or fornication, to embrace a statue of red-hot iron. If he has been guilty of acquisitiveness he must bear a heavy stone on his back, if he has lied his tongue is torn out. Whatever karma a tiva has bound on himself laughing, that he will not escape by weeping. If

Next the demons take the forms of vultures or cocks or crows and tear at his flesh with their beaks, whilst others gogue out his eyes or smash in his teeth. "I Monstrous beasts such as eight-footed packals come to devour him and he is stung by insects and serpents." Nor is this all: the demons stir up in the minds of the hell-dwellers the memory of former enunties and they fight, tearing each other to pieces. "I

```
1 Śr (V) 141-50. 1 Śr (V) 143, 2 Śr (V) 151-5, 4 Dharma-raidyana, 57. 5 Śr (V) 156-9, 5 Śr (V) 160-2. 7 Dharma-raidyana, 47-49. 1 Śr (V) 160-2. 1 Śr (V) 160-
```

* Dharma-rasāyana, 51-56. 10 $r (V) 165. 11 $r (V) 166-9. 12 Dharma-rasāyana, 61-62. 13 $r (V) 170.

Evil-doing may also be expiated in the tiryag-gati. A jiva may wander through countless incarnations in the most primitive forms of life before attaining to rebirth as a paitendrya animal which will suffer from mutilations, heavy burdens, lack of food and drink, and separation from its offspring, and which may be killed and eaten.!

In the māmuyua-gati it may happen that a child is abandoned at birth only to die from exposure or starvation, or if it is abandoned later during childhood it will live miserably as a servantin another's household. Again a man who has given generously to others when he was rich may fall on evil days and not obtain even a plate of gruel when he begs for it. Another may be smitten by a loathsome disease (pāpa-roga) such as leprosy and obliged to live outside the city cut off from frends and kin.<sup>2</sup>

But the māmuyva-gat includes also rebirth in the bhoga-bhīmi. The descriptions of these fairy-tale worlds are doubtless an inheritance from popular folk-lore but they have been incorporated into the Jaina cosmography and find mention even in the necessarily brief eptione of the Tatwitha-sitrus. The Digambaria stivauk-acāra texts are notable for the way in which they link rebirth in the bhoga-bhūmu with the performance of dāṇa. No interest is shown in the geographical location of these regions but their classification is linked with that of the pātrus or recipients of alms to that, for example, giving to an uttama-bhoga-bhūmu or giving to a ku-pātra rebiir thi na ku-bhoga-bhūm.

The inhabitants of the uttamae, madhyamae, and jaghanyahoga-bhāmus are differentiated only by the lustre of their bodies, their height, and their life-span, both of these being expressed with the licence of numerical fantasy. All alike are exempt from the sufferings of disease, untimely accidents, and old age, they feel no pain, mental or physical, and there is no strife among them. Born always together in couples, they attain maturity in forty-nine days' and they die a paniese death when their children are born, the men expiring with a sneeze, the women with a yawn. The former are endowed with the seventy-two arts and the latter with the sixty-four gunas and both have the thirty-two lakspana's and show a very slight development of the kasāyas. For this reason when they die they are reborn at once in the deva-loka (whilst the devas of course have only to expect a human or animal incarnation).1 Throughout their long lives all their wants are supplied from ten wish-fulfilling trees (kalpa-drumas):2

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sr (V) 177-82. <sup>2</sup> Sr (V) 183-90. <sup>3</sup> Sr (A) x1 62-67, Sr (V) 245-8 <sup>3</sup> Sr (V) 258-60 <sup>4</sup> Sr (A) x1. 79-82 <sup>5</sup> Sr (A) x1. 79-82 <sup>6</sup> Sr (V) 263 <sup>7</sup> Sr (V) 263

- (1) madvāriga-supplying tasty and nutritive drinks:
- (2) tūryānga—supplying musical instruments;
- (3) bhūsanānga-supplying ornaments such as ear-rings and diadems:
- (4) ivotir-ānga-supplying light more radiant than that of sun or moon:
- (5) prhāriga—supplying houses:
- (6) bhājanānga-supplying plates and dishes;
- (7) dipānga-supplying illumination indoors;
- (8) vastrānga—supplying clothes of silk or fine cloth:
- (o) malanga—supplying garlands of the finest flowers with the choicest perfumes:
- (10) bhojananga-supplying the fourfold aliments of the best quality,3

An incarnation in a ku-bhoga-bhūmi resulting from almsgiving to a ku-pātra is less desirable. The inhabitants of these regions have no clothes or ornaments or houses and live underneath the trees feeding on their leaves and flowers and sometimes eating an earth which resembles jaggery.4 Instead of human heads they may have those of hons or elephants or other beasts; some have horns, some tails, some only one leg, and some again are devoid of speech.5 Yet they, too, because they are lacking in kasayas, are reborn in the devaloka, becoming vyantara gods; as a sequel to this, however, they have a bad human incarnation.6

The estate of a deva which has been attained by long practice of asceticism and self-control in the human incarnation may yet, through the ripening of karma, bring no abiding happiness. The dwellers in heaven like those on earth are divided into castes separated by even more rigid barriers than among men. Rebirth in one of the categories of servile devas even though human afflictions are absent will bring sorrow and vexation from envy at the sight of the more fortunate devas.1

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sr (A) x1. 72-73

&lt;sup>2</sup> Hindu mythology recognizes normally five kalpa-drumas. Cf. Amara-koşa, 1. 1, 50. 5 Ibid. 542. 3 Sr (V) 250-7. 4 BhS (D) 537.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid. 544.

A fire who goes to the deva-loka comes into existence spontaneously in a perfumed upapāda-grha. He has a perfumed breath, a flawless body, and unaging youth. As he is thus born he cannot at first realize where he is, and like one awakened from sleep he imagines himself to be dreaming. Then as the aparases welcome him he comprehends by avadhi-jāāna what has occurred. Hawing hathed and adorned himself he goes at once to the Jaina temple to make pājā to the Jina in the same way as this is done on earth but with greater splendour. So he pursues the life of untrammelled pleasure that is the lot of the divine beings, pusing always to make the 'fina-pūjā at the five kalyānas and in the Nandīšvaracarran.'

It is when six months only of life as a deva remain to him that his great sadness comes. As he sees his clothes and ornaments becoming tarnished he realizes that the time to fall from his lotty estate has come, and he weeps to think that he must pass mine months in an abode of pus and blood—the human womb. Aware that he has no means of escape, that not even the lord of the devas can save him, he formulates the wish in his mind that he may be reborn as an ekendriya. And so even this miserable destuny may come to pass.

THE SRAVAKA-GUNAS

This treatment of the duties of the ideal layman on the basis of a varying number of qualities characterizing the person apt to receive the Jana creed and fulfill its teaching enjoyed considerable popularity with the later Svetāmbaras as a means of exposition. A list of thirty-five such qualities or is the statement of the treatment of the statement of twenty-one statuta-ginnar had figured in the Dharma-ratina-

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sr (V) 191-4.

<sup>2</sup> Sr (V) 495-508

<sup>3</sup> Sr (V) 195-203,

<sup>4</sup> YS 1'47-56 Windisch, in his editio princeps of the first four prokatas of the Yoga-lartra, surmised that these verses were an interpolation.

praharana* by Śānti Sūri and may indeed belong to an earlier writer. Vague lists of the virtues which a layman ought to possess must have long been current; they are in fact to be found in the hathā literature wherever the excellences of a hero are described. The canonical texts contain enumerations of abstract qualities, good or bad, which perhaps provided the original basis. It seems, however, to have been Harbhadra who first—in the Dharma-bradu*—attempted to lay down in a clear and precise fashion in sitra style the principles of conduct in everyday life which would, if properly observed, make of a man a model śrāvadza. In his famous hulaba Hemacandra has versified Harbhadra's sitras—or at least those which he found most apt—adding to them almost by way of afterthought a half-dozen epithets from the already current list of Sāns Sūri.

In view of the importance of numerology in Jaina writings it is perhaps worth noting that all the lists of śräwaka-gunas (except that of elevengiven by the Digambara Amitagati, which will be discussed separately) are couched in multiples of seven. Thus, beside the hirty-five of Hemacandra and the twenty-one of Sānti Sūri, there are the fourteen śrāwaka-gunas of Āšādhara, against which it would not be unfitting to set the seven virtues of the giver (dātr-guna) and the seven virusanat and seven §ilas.

Though he does not use the term sizuoda-guna Haribhadra devotes the whole of the second adhyāya of the Dharma-bindu to a detailed consideration of this subject, which he qualifies as the general (āmānya) aspect of the householder's religion, the specific quistag aspect being the observance of the wratas and of ritual practices such as pūjā. Hemacandra expounds his own kulaka in a very extensive prose commentary which serves as a quarry for later writers. The most important of these, Jinamandana belongs to the fifteenth century, but his work, a compilation from earlier sources, will be drawn on for illustration in this study.

DhRP 5-7. 2 DhB 1.

<sup>3</sup> SDhA 1. 11.

It is carrous that Mrs Stevenson, in The Heart of Januars, failed to realize that the laist of twenty-one and durty-five both referred to the inflooding-time. On p. 244 she offers a trunslation of Hermicandri's hulada under the title: Thirty-five rules of conduct, and on p. 224, a rather inaccurate rendering of Start Star's last, which she calls 'those twenty-one qualities which distinguish the Juna gentleman."

Voca-sastra	DHARMA-BINDU	PRAKARANA	DHARMAMRTA
No sus compound white	ny avonattam vittam		nvāvonātta-dhana
(2) Sistăcăra-prasamsaka	sista-carita-prasamsana	1	1
(2) kula-silax-samah sarddham anya-	samāna-kula-sīlādibhir a-gotra-jair		tad-arha-grhim-sthān'-
potra-iath krtodyāha	vaivāhyam	1	ālaya
	drstādrsta-bādhā-bhīrutā	bhīru	agha-bhī
(4) prasiddham desācāram samācaran	prasiddha-desācāra-pālanam	1	1
<ul><li>(6) a-vama-vēdī na kvāpi rājādisu</li></ul>	sarvesv a-varna-vāda-tyāgo	sat-katha	sad-gır
	viścsato rajadięu
(7) anattwyakta-gupte sthäne su-	sthäne grha-karanam, amprakatätu-	su-pakṣa-yukta	tad-arha-grhinī-
prātivesmike aneka-nirgama-	guptam asthānam anucita-		sthānālaya
dvāra-viv arjita-niketana	prătives am ca
(8) sad-ācāruh krta-sanga	samsargah sad-ācārash	1	ārya-samıtı
(9) mātā-pitroh pūjaka	mātā-pitr-pūjā	vinita	valan guna-gurûn upaplutam sthänam tvajan	upapluta-sthäna-tyägah	1	1
gathite pravitta	garhitesu gadham apravrttih	-	1
vyayam äyocıtam kurran	ayocito vyavah	ı	- veşam vittānusāratah kurvan	vibhav'-adv-anurūpo vesah	1	1
aştabhır dhî-gunarr yukta	ühāpohādı-1 ogah	1	pranha
dharmam anvaham śrnvāna	pratyaham dharma-śrav anam		dharma-vidhim éravan
ajīme bhojana-tyāgin	ajirne 'bhojanam	1	1
kāje bhoktā sātmyatah	sātmvatah kāla-bhojanam	1	vuktāhāra-vihāra
anyonyāpratībandhena trīvargam	anyony anubaddha-trivarga-	1	anyonvānugunam
	pratipattih		triversam bhaian
(19) yathāvad atıthau sādhau dine ca	devătithi-dina-pratipattih	1	. 1 pratipatti-krt
(20) sadānabhınıvişta	sarvatrānabhınıveśah	madhvastha-saumva-drsti
(21) gunesu paksa-patm	guna-pakşa-pātītā	puna-raen

DHARMÄMRTA	1	ı	1	1	1	1	krta-jña		hrimaya	davalu	1	ı	1	Conference	111700 4
DHARMA-RAINA PRAKARANA	-	1	vrddhānuga	. 1	su-dîrgha-darsin	višesa-iña	krta-jña	loka-priva	layalu	dayālu	prakrti-saumya	para-hita-kārin	1	1
DHARMA-BINDU	adeśākāla-caryā-parīhārah	balābalāpeksanam	vrtta-stha-jñāna-vrddha-sevā	bhartavya-bharanam	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	an-şad-varga-tyägah	1
YOGA-SÄSTRA	(22) adeśákalayoś caryām tyajan	(23) balābalam janan	(24) vrtta-stha-jñāna-vrddhānām pūjaka	(25) posya-posaka	6) dirgha-darsin	(27) višesa-jña	(28) krta-jña	(29) loka-vallabha	(30) sa-laya	(31) sa-doya	(32) saumya	(33) paropakṛti-karmaṭha	(34) antarangan-şad-varga-parıhara-	parāyaņa (35) vaši-krtēndrīva-grāma	9

I. POSSESSED OF HONESTLY EARNED WEALTH (nyāya-sambanna-vibhava)

Haribhadra<sup>1</sup> lavs down that a pious lavman should exercise a profession which is beyond reproach and in accordance with family tradition, with due regard for his own substance; for wealth acquired by honest means brings absence from anxiety in this world and leads to a happy reincarnation whilst wrongly acquired wealth has dire consequences like the hook that lodges in the fish's gullet. Rectitude is the sovereign specific for amassing wealth (arthāpty-upamṣad) because it helps to eliminate evil karma; though fortune may in certain circumstances be amassed by dishonesty it will only be transient. For Hemacandra2 honestly earned wealth is money that has not been made by recourse to treason, betraval of friends, breach of trust, theft, false witness, false weights and measures, or deceitful speech. One can enjoy it without apprehension in one's own person and give it to one's friends and kin. Jinamandana3 says roundly that honest poverty is better than ill-gotten riches, which, according to a popular saving, will last for ten years and then vanish entirely in the eleventh. The practice of this guna excludes the pursuit of the fifteen forbidden trades and of gambling and alchemy, and implies a high ethical code in business dealings, and generosity in almsgiving and in charity to those in need.

2. EULOGISTIC OF THE CONDUCT OF THE VIRTUOUS (stria-cara-prasamsaka)

By size Hemacandra' understands 'men of outstanding qualities who have been schooled by intercourse with the virtuous and the learned'. The qualities to be admired in others are courtesy, gratitude, cheerfulness in misfortune, modesty in prosperity, fidelity to tradition, and care to avoid ill repute. The essence of this guna is not to be envious of the virtues of others.

 WEDDED TO A SPOUSE OF THE SAME CASTE AND TRADI-TIONS BUT NOT OF THE SAME GOTRA (kula-ŝila-samaih sărddham anya-gotra-jaih krtodvāha)

Hemacandras understands by sila a common observance of such interdictions as those on drinking wine or eating meat. Jinaman-dana! offers also an alternative explanation; worship of the same devas and guru and performance of the same ceremonies. Municandra, the commentator of the Dharma-bindu,2 infers from identity of caste and tradition that the parties to a marriage will have the same material situation, mode of dress, and language. If there are differences on these points they will not be happy together and there will be clashes between them. Where a wife, for example, belongs to a family much richer than that of her husband she will tend to be contemptuous of him. Hemacandra, Municandra, and Imamandana all find occasion to list here the eight forms of marriage recognized in the Manu-smrts, with the comment that even the four adharmva forms may be held to be dharmva when there is mutual affection between man and wife. According to Hemacandra3 there are four ways of guarding women; having wives of good character like one's mother, not allowing them independence, assigning to them household tasks, and restricting their material possessions. If women are well guarded there will be a properly regulated home, pūjā and dāna will be rightly performed, and children will be well brought up.

4. APPREHENSIVE OF SIN (pāpa-bhīru)

This epithet is common even in the oldest Jaina texts and corresponds to a fundamental concept of the religion. Haribhadra' understands by it the fear of committing offences whether overt or hidden. The former, according to Hemacandra, would mean adultery, theft, whoring, dicing, and similar disastrous acts and the latter meat-cating and wine-drinking and other such vices, all of which lead to reincarnation in hell. Jinamanḍana'o associates with these occasions of stumbling the twenty-two abhalayus and thirty-two ananta-kayas. This guna figures also in Sainti Sūri's latt?

FOLLOWING THE REPUTABLE CUSTOM OF THE COUN-TRY (prasiddham desacāram samācaran)

Hemacandra<sup>3</sup> understands by desācāra the customs prevailing in a particular area in regard to food, clothes, and other aspects of everyday life; if these were not observed unfortunate consequences

1 ŚrGuV, p. 13b.	2 DhB 1. 17.	3 YS, p. 148.
* DhB 1, 16.	5 YS, p. 148.	6 SGuV, p. 19a.
7 DhRP 13

might result from public hostility in the area. Jinamandana¹ goes further: he holds that whist pursuing the dharmāāra, the path of religion, one should also fall in with the bhāxāra, the usages of the world. Since the secular life must of necessity be the basis for all who, living in the world, yet obey the precepts of religion, unfractions of the bhāxāra are to be avoided.

6. Not denigrating other people, particularly rulers (a-varna-vādī na kvāpī rājādīṣu višesataḥ)

Municandra<sup>2</sup> explains that the word 'rulers' is intended to include ministers, court chaplains, and other officials. Hemacandra<sup>1</sup> quotes a verse to show that nican-gotra karma is incurred by expressing contempt for others and glorifying oneself. Overt denigration, always reprehensible, is dangerous when applied to the great ones of the earth as it may result in loss of life and possessions. Relating this gupa to the tatya-vrata, Jinamandana's sees in it a condennation of envy, calumny, and false accusations. It would seem to correspond to the tat-hatha of Sānti Sūri<sup>2</sup> (in Āṣādhara sad-grr) A sat-hathā is defined as a story which glows with truth and narrates the life of a firthanshara or saint.

7. DWELLING IN A PLACE WHICH IS NOT TOO EXPOSED AND NOT TOO ENCLOSED, WITH GOOD NFIGHBOURS, AND FEW EXITS (anativyahte gupte sthäne su-prätivesmike anekamrgama-dvära-i varjita-mketana)

Haribhadra'e lays down that a house should be built in a suitable spot, an unsuitable site being any place where the houses are too close together or too isolated or where there are undesirable neighbours. The construction of the house should be determined by favourable omens and it should not have many exist. If there were many doors ill-disposed people would be able to go in or out unobserved, so jeopardizing the security of goods and chattels and womenfolk. In other words a householder's home should be well guarded. There should be durva and kuia grass, untainted soil, and a supply of fresh water on the site chosen. In too exposed a position it would be easy for thieves to burgle, whilst in too enclosed a position air and light could not reach it and in the event of fire it could not escape. If the neighbours were undesirable,

```
<sup>1</sup> SrGuV, p 20a <sup>2</sup> DhB 1. 31. <sup>3</sup> YS, p. 148.

<sup>4</sup> SrGuV, p 21b <sup>5</sup> DhRP 20. <sup>6</sup> DhB 1. 22-24.
```

such as gamblers, actors, or prostitutes, one's household would be corrupted by listening to their conversations and seeing their actions.<sup>1</sup>

8. ATTACHED TO GOOD MORAL STANDARDS (sad-ācāraiḥ krta-sanga)

This guṇa appears to imply no more than the avoidance of evil company. In Asādhara's list it appears as ārya-samiti.

9. Honouring father and mother (mātā-pitroh pūjaka)

Noting that the word 'mother' is placed first in the compound because of the very great respect to which she is entitled, Hemacandra' explains that respect is to be shown to them by making obeisance at dawn, noon, and dusk, by offering them a phija of blowers and fruit of the finest colour and perfume, by gwing them the best of food, clothes, and other material needs, and by seeking their consent for all affairs of importance in life. Jinamandana' extends the concept 'parents' to include all persons who by their age or position merit reverence. Asadhara uses the designation yajan gunae-gurán for this guna.

10. Eschewing a place of calamity (upaplutam sthänam tyajan)

Hemacandra* explains that in a place of calamity, in other words a town or village where famine or disease are endemic, or where there is war between one's own sovereign and a foreign ruler, the attanment of the tri-varga is impossible; in fact the fund of kāma, artha, and dharma already acquired would be soon dissipated. As an upapluta-sthāma Jinamandana* cites also a country where there are two rulers or no ruler or where government is carried on in the name of a woman or a child.

11. NOT ENGAGING IN A REPREHENSIBLE OCCUPATION (garhite 'pravrtta)

Hemacandras explains that a practice may be deemed especially reprehensible in one country, such as agriculture in Sauvira, or drinking alcohol in Lāṭa, or among one caste, such as the consumption of wine or the sale of sesamum or salt by brahmins, or in one family, such as drinking alcohol in the Caulūkya family. Jinamandana! states with more precision that caste, country, and family tradition and the age in which one lives are the criteria by which an occupation is to be judged. If, for example, a known Jaina were to take food by night be would make a mockery of his religion.

12. Spending in proportion to one's income (vyayam ävocitam kurvan)

Spending, says Hemacandra,2 means the apportioning of one's substance for the maintenance of one's dependants, for one's own comfort and for almsgiving, deva-truia and other purposes, and income means what one earns by trading, tilling the soil, or rearing livestock. Imamandana goes so far as to fix proportions for this division: a man of limited means should divide his income into four shares, one to form a reserve capital, one to be put back into his business, one to be spent for religious purposes and for his own luxuries, and one to be used to provide for his dependants. A rich man, however, could well set aside more than half his income for the dharma and lead a life of frugality on earth.4 In any event the layman's duty is fulfilled by wise spending since miscrliness merely results in the accumulation of wealth to the detriment of one's dependants and one's own self. As Hemacandra2 points out, if a man is unwilling to spend enough to maintain himself in good health he may be incapacited by sickness from conducting his affairs.

13. Dressing in accordance with one's income (veşam vittānusārataļi kurvan)

Hemacandra* explains that the scope here is in fact rather wider than the appellation suggests. If a man does not wear clothes and ornaments suitable to his income, age, social condition, country, and caste, he is liable to become a laughing-stock. This guan is closely linked with the preceding one, as a man who out of miserliness will not spend his money will also dress in rags, and so, falling to obtain the esteem of his fellow citizens, will be no credit to the

&lt;sup>1</sup> SrGuV, p. 32a.

<sup>2</sup> YS, p. 151.

<sup>3</sup> SrGuV, p. 34b.

<sup>4</sup> A division of property in rather different percentages is suggested by Devasena (see BhS(D) 578-80) or soiled clothes; for going to the temple they should choose their best apparel whilst avoiding all ostentation.

<sup>3</sup> YS, p. 152.

14. ENDOWED WITH THE EIGHT KINDS OF INTELLIGENCE (astabhir dhi-gunair vukta)

These are generally in Jaina works enumerated as follows:

- (1) desire to listen (śuśrūsā);
- (2) listening (śravana):
- (3) grasping (grahana);
- (4) memorizing (dhāranā); (5) general knowledge (ūha).²
- (6) specialized knowledge (apoha),2
- (7) knowledge of the substance (artha-vijñāna);
- (8) knowledge of the essence (tattva-vijnana).

To this guna corresponds presumably the praina of Asadhara.

15. LISTENING EVERY DAY TO THE SACRED DOCTRINE (dharmam anvaham śrnvāna)

Wearmess of spirit is removed, says Hemacandra,3 by listening every day to the sacred doctrine. It is because of its importance to the religious life that mere listening (sravana) is classed as one of the dhi-gunas.

16. NOT FATING ON A FULL STOMACH (ajirne bhoiana-tvāgin)

All diseases, according to Hemacandra,3 have their origin in an accumulation of undigested matter in the intestines resulting from eating on a full stomach. This habit is therefore to be avoided in order to maintain the body in health and fitness for the duties of the religious life.

17. EATING AT THE RIGHT TIME ACCORDING TO A DIET-ARY RÉGIME (kāle bhoktā sātmvatah)

Food is to be eaten when one is hungry-in moderation and without gluttony-for an excess of food only provokes vomiting and diarrhoca. On the other hand to go without food when one is hungry only results in lassitude and aversion to nourishment. The food and drink consumed should be those to which one's organism is accustomed since childhood and the view should never be taken that a healthy man can digest anything. Gluttony is senseless since the pleasure of taste is only momentary and all food is the same in flavour once it has passed down the throat 'The right time for eating is neither the night, the early morning, nor the late evening. A pious man should first ensure that his dependants, servants, and livestock have been fed and then dine hunself according to the resources of his kitchen.

* SrGuV. p 36b.

<sup>2</sup> Tha and apoha are, of course, terms of logic and Hemacandra admits another interpretation of them in this sense. For a discussion of their meaning see Stcherbatskoi in Museon, v. 165-7 3 YS, p. 153.

18 FULFILLING THE THRELFOLD AIM OI LIFE WIFHOUT EXCLUDING ANY OF ITS FLFMINTS (anyonya-pratibandhena trwaream sādhavan)

Hemacandra<sup>2</sup> comments at considerable length on the trivarga without which life is no more real than that of the smelter's bellows which breathes but does not live. To live only for the plessures of the senses to the exclusion of aitha and dharma or to live only for money to the exclusion of kāma and dharma lead to endless misfortunes whilst the practice of dharma lead to complete neglect of artha and hāma is proper for ascetics but not for householders Artha and kāma devol of dharma lead to great miseries in the cycle of transmigration, dharma and kāma without a tha result in a heavy burden of debt, and dharma and artha without kāma are tantamomit to a rejection of the lawnan's estate

 DILIGENT IN SUCCOURING THE ASCETICS, THE RIGHT-FOUS, AND THE NIEDY (yathāvad atıthau sādhau dine ca pratipatti-krt)

This implies the offering with due courtesy of food and drink and other gifts in almsgiving to monks (pātra-dāna) and in charity to those in affliction (karunā-dāna).

20. ALWAYS DEVOID OF EVIL MOTIVES (sadānabhmivişta)

An abhnuveśa is characteristic only of the mean-minded and its absence is one of the five gunas of the third bhāva-śrāvaka.3

21. FAVOURABLY INCLINED TO VIRTUES (gunesu pakṣa-pātin)

By guna here Hemacandra' understands benevolence, generosity, readmess to help, patience, and the habit of using courteous and friendly language as well as acts of kindness, as the seed of religious merit is thereby nurtured into growth. This entry on Hemacandra's list has clearly been borrowed from the guna-ragin of Saint Suir.<sup>2</sup>

22. Avoiding action which is inappropriate to time and place (adeśākālayoś caryāṃ tyajan)

Hemacandra<sup>1</sup> explains that anyone who engages in an action at a forbidden time or place will certainly be the victim of some calamity from kings, thieves, or others.

23. AWARF OF ONE'S OWN STRENGTH AND WEAKNESSES (balābalam jānan)

No undertaking can succeed unless one knows the strength and weakness both of oneself and of others as far as these depend on time and place and circumstances. Like the preceding guna this belongs to the realm of nith.

24. Venerating persons of high morality and discernment (vetta-stha-jñāna-vetdhānām pājaka)

According to Hemacandra' vzddha is here to be understood in the sense of old, not in years, but in the faculty of discerning between what should be avoided and what should be approved and in the practice of virtue. Respect expressed by making the aijidi, rising and offering a seat should be accorded them because they abound in good counsel. The same guṇa figures in Sānti Sūri's list as vzddhānuga.

Supporting one's dependants (poşya-poşaka)

Municandra* explains that the dependants include father and mother, wife and children, and, when the head of the household is rich, any childless sister or aged relative and any friend who has fallen into poverty. It is clear that Haribhadra was here thinking also of servants and retainers for in succeeding sitras* he prescribes that a servant should be given suitable work, carefully supervised in his occupations, and protected from misfortune: if he has to be admonished, care should be had for his self-respect. Inamandana elaborates a fourfold division of posya: relatives, divinities, preceptors, and oneself; the relatives must be maintained because otherwise they might be reduced to thieving or vagabondage, thereby bringing discredit on the family.

26 FAR-SIGHTED (dirgha-darsin)

The activities of a far-sighted man are described as leading to much profit with little effort, and are widely lauded. This guna belongs also to Santı Süri,2

27. DISCRIMINATING (viśesa-iña)

This for Hemacandra3 means knowing the difference between what belongs to others and what belongs to oneself, between what is to be done and what is not to be done, a man without discrimination would be indistinguishable from an animal With this guna, says Santi Suri. a man is exempt from the prejudices that stem from love and hate.

28. GRATEFUL (krta-iña)

Santi Suri,5 too, gives this guna; he insists particularly on gratitude to the preceptor for the supreme benefit of the sacred doctrine. Jinamandana6 classifies all human beings into those very many who are devoid of gratitude (krta-phna), those, still numerous, who are grateful for kindness received (krta-iña), those few who are ready to do a favour in return for a favour (pratyupakāraka), and those very few who are ready to do a kindness (niskāranopakāraka) without receiving anything in return.

29. WELL-LIKED (loka-vallabha)

For Hemacandra3 this means a man who is well-liked by respectable people: if his character and behaviour do not make him popular he may arouse antipathies which will prevent others from finding the path of enlightenment. Santi Suri7 holds that he should be conspicuous for almsgiving and virtuous conduct and should avoid everything that is contrary to this world or to the next.

- SrGuV, p 58a 2 DhRP 22 3 YS, p. 148 4 DhRP 23 5 DhRP 25. 6 SrGuV. p 626. 7 DhRP 11.

30. ACTUATED BY A SENSE OF SHAME (sa-lajja)

This guṇa again belongs also to Śānti Sūri. It implies that a man's sense of shame forbids him to commit sinful acts: he will abide by the dharma cost what it may.

31. COMPASSIONATE (sa-daya)

This guṇa, again common to Santi Sūri,2 is of the very essence of Jainism and needs no comment.

32. GENTLE IN DISPOSITION (saumya)

This evidently implies that because of his gentle disposition a man may be eastly propitated whilst a man of a different disposition will alienate friends and relations. Because of his gentleness, too, he will eschew cruel occupations. Sānti Sūri¹ gives this guna as trakti-saurusa.

33. Ready to render service to others (paropakett-karmatha)

This guna seems to correspond to two entries in Santi Sūri's list: para-inta-kārın and su-dāksmva.*

34. Intent on avoiding the SIX adversaries of the SOUL (antarangāri-sad-varga-parihāra-parāyana)

The six enemies are lust (kāma), anger (krodha), greed (lobha), pride (māna), vanglory (mada), and malicious pleasure (haraa). Pride means the rejection of salutary advice through arrogance, particularly the refusal to hear the sacred doctrine; vainglory implies pride in one's own family, or personal beauty, or strength, or knowledge; and malicious pleasure lies in causing unnecessary pain to others or in addiction to such vices as hunting. 6

35. Victorious over the organs of sense (vasi-kṛte-ndriya-grāma)

Victory over the senses is described as nobler than victory in battle. This guna figures in Āśādhara's list as vaśin.

Some of the śrāvaka-guṇas of Sānti Sūri were shown against DhRP 16.

 DhRP 17
 DhRP 10.
 DhRP 15, 27.
 With the omission of made these correspond to the 'five fires' pañcāgm mentioned by Somadevs (Handiqui, p 288).

&quot; YS, p. 160.

those of Hemacandra, to which they correspond. Here is the full list:

- (1) aksudra-not mean-minded or concerned with trivialities;
- (a) riganat—physically well-proportioned. This is understood to mean 'not defective in any of the five senses, of sout bodily constitution, and of sound aigus and updangat'. (The angus are eight in number: the head, chest, back, belly, arms and legs, the updanga being the fingers, toes, &c.). The explanation of this guna has caused some difficulty' to the commentators, who point out that there have also been good Jainas of misshapen body. It has doubtless been included in the list in imitation of the conventional descriptions of the Tirthankara, who is of surpassing beauty of form. A good physical build is also linked with the capacity to perform feats of assentism.
- (3) prakrti-saumya--naturally gentle in disposition and therefore not apt to bear rancour.
- (4) loka-priya well-liked because one is generous, courteous, and well-behaved.
- (5) akrūra not cruel or evilly disposed;
- (6) bhiru-apprehensive of sin,
- (7) asatha-not deceitful, but rehable,
- (8) su-dākunya -- ready to lay aside one's own business in order to render service to others;
- (9) laŋālu—actuated by a sense of shame so that one avoids evil actions,
- (10) dayālu—compassionate,
- (11) madhyastha-saumya-drsti—of serene and unprejudiced outlook.
- (12) guna-rāgin-favourably inclined to virtues;
- (13) sat-katha—avoiding unprofitable speech, or, more specifically, the vi-kathas. The word sat is to be understood as having the significance which attaches to the word satya in the interpretation of the satya-trata;
- (14) *u-pakva-yukta—having a proper ambience. In other words one's family and household should be favourably disposed towards the dharma; otherwise it will not be properly carned out:

- (15) su-dīrgha-darśin—far-sighted so that one undertakes actions which result in good, not harm;
- (16) viśeṣa-jña—discriminating;
- (17) vrddhāmuga—following the decisions of men with ripened minds, because old men do not engage in sinful activity;
- (18) vinita—possessed of vinaya, i.e. offering respect to all those to whom it is due;
- (19) krta-jña-grateful;
- (20) para-hitāriha-kārin—devoted to the welfare of others. The possessor of this guna is to be distinguished from the sudāssnyra, who helps when his help is sought, by his readiness to go out of his way to assist others, and to put them on the rupht path even if he is not asked:
- (21) labdha-laksa—having achieved one's goal, i.e. understand-

As has been mentioned elsewhere the frāvaha is classified by the categories of nāma, shāṇanā, dravya, and bhāva. Now Sānti Sūri does not confine himself to the discussion of the twenty-one guṇas but deals more extensively with the bhāra-irāvaha, who is said to he of six types, each of these being distinguished by various qualities which in fact amount to additional śrāvaha-gunas, though the term guna is only assigned to a few of them. Here is the full classification:

- 1. krta-vrata-karman-who carries out the vows-1
  - listening with vinaya to the exposition of the vratas by an authoritative teacher;
  - (ii) comprehending the vratas with their bhangas and aticaras.
  - (ni) accepting the vratas:
  - (iv) zealously observing the vratas even in adversity.
- śilavat who is possessed of virtues (śila):²
  - (1) frequenting the temple;
  - (ii) avoiding entry into other buildings or houses without due cause;
  - (iii) always soberly dressed;
  - (iv) not speaking under the stress of emotion;

- (v) avoiding foolish amusements, which are a form of anarthadanda:
- (vi) conducting one's business in a polite fashion (not using harsh words such as dasi-putra 'son of a bitch').
- 3. gunavat-who is possessed of good qualities (guna):1
  - (i) always zealous in svādhyāya;
  - (ii) always zealous in the performance of the daily duties; (iii) always zealous in vinaya,
  - (vi) devoid of evil prejudices (abhinivesa) in all activities,
  - (v) having faith in the Jaina doctrine.
  - (1) 1141111 111 1111 1111 1111
- 4. rju-vyavahārin—who acts uprightly.2
  - (1) speaking in accordance with the facts;
  - (11) acting without guile;
  - (iii) pointing out misfortunes which may ensue from a course of action, (There is some uncertainty here: this is also explained as 'pointing out proper ways of acting, i.e. those taken from textbooks of artha and dha ma but not of kāma'.)
  - (iv) being genuinely friendly.
- 5. guru-śuśrūsā-who is obedient to the guru 13
  - serving the guru by making pratikramana and preventing hindrance to meditation:
  - (ii) stimulating others to do likewise by praising the guru;
  - (iii) providing herbs and medicaments for the guru,
  - (iv) revering the guru
- 6. pravacana-kuśala-who is expert in the sacred lore:4
  - (i) proficient in the recitation of the sūtras;
  - (ii) proficient in the meaning of the sūtras;
  - (iii) proficient in the general rules (utsarga),
     (iv) proficient in the special rules (apavāda);
  - (v) proficient in intention:
  - (vi) proficient in practical application.

Sāntı Sūrı further describes seventeen characteristics (styled guņas or laksanas) of the bhāva-śrāvaka which again may be assimilated to the śrāvuka-guṇas. They are classified under the following heads:

```
<sup>1</sup> DhRP 42-46. <sup>2</sup> DhRP 47-48. <sup>3</sup> DhRP 49-51. <sup>4</sup> DhRP 52-55. <sup>3</sup> DhRP 56-77.
```

- (1) stri-he knows the wiles of women:
  - (2) indriva-he keeps a tight rein on the horses of the senses;
- (3) artha-he realizes that material wealth is transient;
- (4) samsāra—he comprehends the insubstantial nature of the visible world, a place of woe:
- (5) visaya—he is averse to the poison of the senses,
- (6) āramhha—he seeks to avoid harmful activity;
- (7) grha-he esteems the household life a bondage;
- (8) darśana—he maintains right belief;
- (9) gaddarika-pravāha—he avoids the unreflecting, sheep-like actions of the vulgar herd;
- (10) āgama-pravrtti—he carries out the āvaśyakas and other Jaina duties;
- (11) dānādi-pravartana—he practises the fourfold dharma to the best of his ability,
- (12) vihrika-he is not ashamed of performing religious duties,
- (13) arakta-drett—he is devoid of desire or of distaste for material things.
- (14) madhyastha-he always takes an objective view;
- (15) asambaddha—he is not fettered by the spirit of acquisitiveness:
- (16) parārtha-kāmopabhogin—he continues to enjoy the pleasures of the world only out of consideration for others;
- (17) grha-tāsa—he remains in the lay estate but with the idea always in mind "Today or tomorrow I will abandon it', like a harlot who is thinking of changing her lover; it is as if he already belonged somewhere else.

The enumerations of Sānti Sūri add nothing new to the content of the frāvahācāra; they are made up of vague moral qualities interspersed with reaffirmations of certain basic precepts of Jainism and are only detailed here for the sake of completeness and because of the confusing character of certain terms employed.

It remains to see to what extent the śrāvākā-guṇas have found a place in the Digambara setting. As has already been noted the fourteen listed by Āśādhara represent an undısguised borrowing from Hemacandra, but a century or so earlier Amitagati¹ had described the parama-viāvaka in eleven epithets which he himself designated as gunas. His enumeration runs as follows:

- (1) devoid of lust, envy, deceit, anger, backbiting, meanness, and vainglory (kāmāsiya-māyā-matsara-paisinya-dainya-mada-hina);
- (2) steadfast (dhira);
- (3) of contented mind (prasanna-citta);
- (4) fair-spoken (privamvada);(5) tender-hearted (vatsala),
- (5) tender-hearted (var.
- (6) competent (kuśala),
- (7) skilled in discerning what is to be accepted and what eschewed (heyādēya-patista),
- (8) ready in mind to adore the guru's feet(guru-caranārādhanodyata-manīsa);
- (9) having the taints on one's heart washed clean by the Jina's words (\(\frac{\partial}{ma-racana-tova-dhauta-vo\tilde{a}nta-halanka\).
- (10) apprehensive of the samsara (bhava-cibhiru),
- (11) having one's lust for sensual objects diminished (mandikrta-sakala-visaya-krta-grddhi)

There is a chance mention of the śrāraka-gunas in Vasunandin<sup>1</sup> but whether this refers to those listed by Amitagati or to some totally different concept it is impossible to say

THE KRIYAS

The word long is vague and ambiguous and is applied in Jaina texts to practices of various kinds. Here it will be restricted to the tites which have been modelled on, and to some extent correspond to, the Hindu samvkāras i It is in the Adn-purāna that the first description of these is to be found though whether Jinasena himself conceived the idea of giving to his co-religionists a framework of ceremonies similar to that which ruled the lives of their Hindu neighbours or whether he merely gave form to concepts which were already current is uncertain. The starting-point for the elaboration of the kriyās may well have lain in the narratives of the lives of the Jinas and in the custom of commemorating the five kalyānas associated with each of them but Hindu or pan-Indian elements dominate those rites which deal with the lay life.

<sup>1</sup> Śr (V) 389

&lt;sup>2</sup> Glasenapp (op cit., pp 408–19), in discussing the kriyar, treated Jinasena's list rather summarily and concentrated on the Acara-dinakara, for which he accepted too early a date
<sup>3</sup> MP xxxviii 50–311.

Jinasena enumerates for the whole of a man's life—both as a layman and after taking the vows—a total of fifty-three hryār. Now this figure has a quite special importance. The Ratna-sāra, an early work ascribed to Kundakunda but, probably considerably later, includes the following verse:

guna-vaya-tavu-sama-padimā danam jala-galaņam ca anatthamiyam damsaņa-nāna-cārittam kiriyā tevanna sāvayā bhaniyā<sup>2</sup>

This is understood to mean that the 53 kryss are made up of the smile_runa. I evatars, 12 lepas, samada, 1 p atmās, 4 dānas, jala_galana, a-rātr-shojana, and the ratma-traya. If this figure of fifty-three kryjūs, already current, was familiar to Jinasena a deliberate or unconscious misconstruction of its meaning may have led him to give it a totally different field of application. At the same time to original sense must have been maintained in certain milieux as the verse from the Ratma-sāra is quoted, as late as the sixteenth century, by Rājamalla in the Lāja-samhtats.

Lake so many similar blueprints for living, the diagrammatic representation of man's progress from the cradle to the grave out-lined in the kryūš is, of course, idealized, as the emphasis on the monkish life and on the individual's gradual rise in the spiritual hierarchy bear witness. Dikās—the acceptance of the monk's vows—is, by a convenient fiction that goes back to the Svetāmbara canon, assumed to be an inevitable stage in the normal human destiny. But the unreality of the overall picture does not impair the validity of Jinasena's achievement. For the first time in Jain history the rites de passage are incorporated in the religious framework instead of being thrust aside as proper only for the deśacāra; the outline of existence is more complete, more rounded, than that offered by any previous Jaina writer.

But the price to be paid for this is a considerable one. Hindu ideas and Hindu customs make deep inroads in those Jaina circles where Jinasena is an accepted authority, that is in the tradition represented by Jinasena, Camundariya, and to some extent by

&lt;sup>1</sup> See P V Kane, op cit , vol 11, pt. 1, pp. 188-267.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ratna-sāra, 153 Lāṭi-saṃhtā, inserted after ii. 5.

Ašādhara. But it is not the claborate pattern of the Adi-puāṇa which is to survive when the Jainas as a community finally lose access to the sources of power. It is rather in the fifteenth-century Svetāmbara work, the Acāra-dinakara, that we find a picture of the sambāra that is still recognizable, whilst the seventeenth-century Digambara Traincaraukācāra, which has retained the names of Jinasena's kriyās (at least of those which relate to the lay life), describes in fact virtually the same rites as those given in the Ācāra-dinakara.

Of the fifty-three kriyās the majority record stages in the ascetic's progress and only the first twenty-two are germane to the present study: they are listed below together with those noted by Vardhamāna and those in fact described by Somasena:

	Adi-purāna	Ācāra-dinakara	TRAIVARNIKĀCĀRA
(I)	garbhādhāna		garbhādhāna
(2)	prītı		moda
	suprite	garbhādhāna
	dhrti		pumsavana
	moda	pumsisana
	priyodbhava (jāta- karman)	jāti-karman	śuci-karman
(7)	nāma-karman		nāma-karman
(8)	bahır-yana	(suryendu-darśana) (ksīrāšana) (sasta)	bahır-yana
(9)	nısıdyä	śuci-karman (nāma-karana)
(10)	anna-piāśana	anna-präsana	anna-präsana
	vyusti	(karna-vedha)
	keśa-vāpa (caula- karman)	cûdā-karana	caula-karman
(13)	lıpı-samkhyüna	adhvayanārambha	lipi-samkhyāna (and pustaka-grahana)
	upanitı	upanay ana	upanayana
	vrata-caryū		vrata-caryā
	vratāvatarana	vratáropa	vratávatarana
	vivāha	vivāha	vivāha
	varna-läbha		varna-läbha
	kula-caryā		kula-caryā
	grhīstā		grhīsitā
	praśänti		praéanti
	grha-tyāga		grha-tyäga
(23)	dikṣā	(antya-samskāra)	dikşā

i Garbhādhāna

This, as described by Jinasena, is in effect a ritual coitus for the sake of begetting a son. It must take place at the rtu, that is when the woman has taken her purifying bath after the cessation of the catamenia. Three cabras are placed on the right of the Juna image, three chattras on the left, and three holy fires in front. Husband and wife, recting mantras, carry out the Jina-piqia and then make oblations to the three fires as was done, says Jinasena, at the nurviga of the Juna. They are then to copulate without passion for the sake of procreation.

The details furnished by the Traivarmkācāra2 are worth noting if only as evidence of the inroads of Hinduism during the seven centuries which separate Somasena from Jinasena. The garbhādhāna is envisaged—as was no doubt Iinasena's intention—as an act of religious preparation by day followed by a ritual coitus by night. Before intercourse the woman is to bathe her pudenda with the pañca-garva and the man to say a prayer to the goddess of the you, and during the act he is to think on the Jina and recite the namaskara. Amongst the beliefs noted are the need to light a candle -copulation in the dark causes poverty-to wear green, and to chew betel. Sexual congress during the period immediately after menstruation described as the kāma-yajña for laymen is not only suggested but made obligatory, since-and here the Hindu influence shows itself at its strongest-if the couple fail to approach each other during the rtu they will be submerged with the pitrs in a terrible hell.

In the Acāra-dmakara the garbhādhāna is given quite a different meanng, it is a ceremony performed in the fifth month after conception to strengthen the foetus in the womb. Vardhamāna lays down that like all other kryūš up to and including vieāhā it may be performed erther by a Jaina brahmin or by a kṣullaka (here used in its modern sense of a layman in the eleventh pratimā) and does not require the presence of a sadhus.

2. PRITI

This ceremony is performed in the third month of pregnancy by brahmins who are prila. The Jina-pinja is to be made with mantras, an arch (torana) being exected over the door and two full water vessels (kalaia) placed alongside it. If the householder has the means he should arrange for the playing of drums and the sounding of bells.*

The Traivarnikācāra mentions the names only of this and the two following krīvās without giving details.

3. SUPRITI

This is carried out in the fifth month by good laymen paramopāsaka) who are su-prita. Like the garbhādhāna it is to take place in the presence of the fires kindled before the Jina image.

4. DHRTI

This is to be performed in the seventh month and once again by layman and in accordance with the same ritual. Its purpose is to strengthen the foctus in the womb.<sup>2</sup>

5. MODA

Jinasena prescribes that this ceremony is to take place a little before the completion of the ninth month, being performed by brahmins in order to fatten the foetus (pa bha-purtyai). The woman is decked in her ornaments and made to wear a gātrikā-bandha (apparently a girdle on which mantrus have been written) as well as a bracelet to serve as a phylactery.<sup>3</sup>

The moda described by Somasena's would seem more properly to correspond to the prift of Junasena since it is performed in the third month. The woman rubs her body with oil, bathes with water, takes a fruit in her hand, and makes the Juna-pipia Then together with her husband she goes to the temple to make the eightfold pipia to the arhats, and to the yakua and yakunis The man touches her and ties a yantra to her neck.

The ceremony, which really in time sequence corresponds to the moda, is, in the Acara-dinakina, the pinniacuna, a direct borrowing from I Indiusm designed essentially to ensure the birth of a son. Vardhamāna lays down that this is to be carried out in the eighth month from conception when all the pregnancy longings (dohala) have been fulfilled and the breasts are full of milk. The woman is ideal in new clothes and taken outdoors by night whilst manitras intended to ensure an easy delivery are recited. Gifts of money and sweetmeats are distributed. On this occasion the presence of the husband is not essential. That Vardhamāna's description of this kriyā has a connexion with the moda seems suggested by the epithet tac-charira-pūrṇi-bhāva-pramoda-rūpam 'expressing the joy that her body is full' used in the opening sentence.

&lt;sup>1</sup> MP xxxviii. 80-81 2 I <sup>3</sup> Ibid 83-84. 4

ADK, pp 86-96

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ibid 82 <sup>4</sup> TrA viii 5-62.

6. PRIYODBHAVA OR JĀTA-KARMAN

The details of this, the birth ceremony are, according to Jinasena, too extensive to be given in his Adi-purāṇa and may be found in the Upāsakādhyayana. The essential features are the reciting of mantras and meditation on the birth of the Jina.

In the Activa-dinakara* the main preoccupation at birth is the horoscope. Whilst the woman is in labour in the attithat-grha the guru should want with the astrologer near at hand praying to the parametihm: The astrologer must be informed of the exact moment of burth in order to cast the horoscope. A prayer is made to the goddess Ambikā to guard the child. No largesse is to be distributed on this occasion because of the burth impurity.

Vardhamāna describes a number of ceremonies following upon the birth for which there are no parallels in the Ads-paña. These include the ksirādana' or putting of the infant to suck, the suryendudariana' or solemn showing of the sun and moon to the mother and newly born child, and the sasti-samikāra' or adoration of the cight goddesses who are called 'the mothers'. When the birth pollution is at an end—tis duration varies with a person's caste—mother and child and all the members of the family bathe and the purification ceremony or such-atmana's is celebrated.

7. Nāma-Karman

Twelve days after the birth at an auspicious time for parents and child a name that will prosper the family is to be conferred on the child. This is to be chosen from among the 1,008 names of the Jina by the ghata-patita method, that is, by drawing from a pot filled with scraps of paper on which names have been written, one name at hazard?

The Travarnukācāra³ says that this is to be performed on the twelfth, sixteenth, twentieth, or thirty-second day after birth or at the first anniversary. The father writes down the name praying to the lord of a 1,008 names and then makes an offering to the valuar.

```
<sup>1</sup> MP xxxviii 85-86

<sup>4</sup> ADK, pp 11a-11b

<sup>7</sup> MP xxxviii. 87-80
```

&lt;sup>2</sup> ADK, pp. 9b-10b. <sup>5</sup> ADK 12b-13b

<sup>3</sup> ADK, p. 12a. 6 ADK 14a-14b. 8 TrA vm 111-25.

In the Acara-dmakara1 the family has to assemble with the guru and astrologer on the same day as the suci-karman or a day or so later. After the horoscope has been exhibited the guru whispers to an aunt the name agreed on by the family. Then after a Yinapūjā at home or in the temple she makes known this name.

8. BAHIR-YANA

This ceremony takes place from two to four months after birth when for the first time the child is taken outdoors by the mother or the nurse. The gifts he receives on that occasion from his kinsfolk are kept and only handed over to him when he assumes the administration of his father's estate.2

Somasena3 understands by the bahir-vana (performed in the first, third, or fourth month of life) the child's first visit to the temple with his parents and kinsfolk. In honour of the occasion gifts of clothing are made to the saigha and there is a general distribution of betel.

o. Nisadyā

In this ceremony the child is seated on a specially adorned couch whilst pūjā is made to the Jina.4 The name only is mentioned by Somasena.

10. Anna-präsana

This is the wearing ceremony placed by Jinasenas in the seventh or eighth month and again accompanied by a būiā. Somasena6 gives the additional detail that after the puia the child is put on the father's lap and given some rice mixed with sugar, milk, and ghee to eat.

The Acara-dmakara7 places this ceremony in the sixth month for a boy and in the fifth month for a girl. Various types of grain and fruits belonging to the region are offered in puja to the Jina. The image is then bathed with the pañcāmrta, some of which is given to the child. Offerings are then set before the family divinity and the mother puts some of this consecrated food in the child's mouth

```
1 ADK 14b-15b
3 TrA viii 126-30
```

<sup>2</sup> MP xxxvni 90-92 4 MP xxxvni 93-94.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid 95

<sup>6</sup> TrA viii. 136-9.

<sup>7</sup> ADK 16a-16b

11. VYUSTI OF VARSA-VARDHANA

This ceremony, which takes place a year later, comprises pūjā, distribution of largesse, and the feasting of kinsfolk. It, too, receives only a bare mention in the Traivarnikācāra.

12. KEŚA-VĀPA OF CAULA-KARMAN

After the child has been sprinkled with scented water his head is shaved: whether or not a top-knot is left depends on his caste. When he has been bathed and anounted and his best ornaments put on he is made to reverence the munis and is given a benediction by his kinsfolk.

Somasena' says that this krjvā should be performed in the first, thrtd, fifth, or seventh year of age. If the previous krjvāt have been neglected a penance should first be carried out. It should not be done at a time when the mother is pregnant again or else she will have a muscarrage or bring forth a still-born child.

The same limits of age are prescribed by the Acāra-dinaharā for the karṇa-vedha or ear-piercing ceremony which symbolically renders the child receptive to the Jaina teaching. The caula-karnan³ is to follow at an unspecified date after this, a complete tonsure being prescribed for śūdras, and the top-knot being left in the case of the higher castes. Food, clothes, and begging-bowls are to be distributed to the monks and clothes and ornaments given to the barber.

13. Lipi-samkhyäna

At the age of five the child is to begin to learn to read and write and a learned layman is to be engaged as teacher. Somasena divides this kriyā into two: ltpi-samkhyāna and pustaka-grahana. The accompanying pūjā is directed to Sarasvatī.

14. UPANĪTI<sup>8</sup>

This, the initiation or investiture, coincides with the conferment of the vows by which a boy is dedicated to the life of a student (all he has learned hitherto is to read and write). These he must assume

- MP xxxviii. 96-97.
- <sup>3</sup> TrA viii. 147-62.
- * ADK, pp. 18a-18b.
  7 TrA viii. 163-81.

- <sup>2</sup> Ibid. 98–101. <sup>4</sup> ADK, pp. 17a–17b. <sup>6</sup> MP xxxviii. 102–3.
- <sup>7</sup> TrA viii. 163-81.
  <sup>8</sup> Aśādhara describes this kriyā in the Sāgāra-dharmāmrta, giving exactly similar details (SDhA vii 20).

C 787

in the Jaina temple after making pūjā at the same time that he puts on the girdle of muūjā grass (mauūji-baudhā). He will be wearing a top-knot, will be clad in a white louncloth and a white outer loth, and will have no ornaments but will be given the sacred thread which is symbolic of his vows. He may take a new name suitable for this way of life. He must live by begging his food: a boy of princely family may, however, satisfy this requirement by begging food from the women's apartments of the palace, but in any event the best of what he obtains in this way must be first offered in pūjā to the Jina. The recommended age for this ceremony is the eighth year from concention.

The Ācāna-dmakara<sup>2</sup> makes it clear that the upaniti is only for the higher castes, for brahmins study begins at eight, for heating at ten, for vaivas at twelve, terminating in all cases at sixteen.

15. VRATA-CARYĀ

During the period passed in study the mauñij-bandha in three coils about the lone stands for the vatua-traya, the white loneloth symbolizes the purity of the arhais, the yajinpariti on the chest signifies the seven parama-sthänas, and the perfect tonsure remores the tonsure of mind, speech, and body. The brahmacārın must keep the five anu-vratas Toothpicks, betel, and collyrum are forbidden to him and he must bathe only with water without using perfumes. He must not be on a bed but directly on the ground, and his body must not have contact with other bodies. He must study first of all the duties of a layman and then philosophy, grammar, metrics, artha-fistra, astrology, divination, and mathematics.<sup>3</sup>

16. VRATĀVATARANA

On the conclusion of his studies he drops the special vows but bardes by the ordinary vows, observing for his life long the mūla-guṇaz. With the permission of his guru he assumes clothes, ornaments, and garlands. Though he may abandon the vow of abstinence from luanties he should continue to keep the vow of sexual continence until the next krīyā. If he belongs to a caste which lives by weapons he may retain them either for the sake of his livelihood or for outward show.<sup>4</sup>

17. VIVAHA

With his guru's permission the young man is now able to marry a girl from a suitable family. Members of the higher castes must make pujā to the Jina and perform the marriage ceremony in a holy spot before fire. For seven days after the wedding the couple should have no sexual relations; they should go away to another region, if possible to a place of pilgrimage and then return home with great pomp. At the proper time, i.e. at the rtu, they should copulate for the procreation of children.1

As has already been noted the oldest texts avoid all mention of marriage, and both Digambaras and Svetambaras take over Hindu customs, often following local usages. In general from Hemacandra's time onwards the eight forms of marriage recognized by the Hindu dharma-sastras are listed, despite the fact that some of them run counter to Jama ethics: Aśadhara2 in fact has bluntly characterized the gandharva-vivāha as a secondary manifestation of the vyasana of whoring. In the sphere of number magic it might not be inappropriate here to point out the significance of the number 4, or more often 8, in connexion with marriage. The ideal age of marriage is sixteen for a man, twelve for a girl, or else twenty for a man and sixteen for a girl. In the popular tales a young man, if a merchant, is usually married to eight girls at the same time, whilst kings have a harem of 16,000 wives. The Śrāddha-guna-vivarana3 records sixteen desirable characteristics in a potential wife and sixteen undesirable ones.

Certain aspects of marriage, at least from the Svetambara angle, have already been noted in discussing the śrāvaka-gunas. Vardhamana adds little to these rather general considerations though he would appear to advocate pre-puberty marriage,4 but gives a picture of the pomp of the ceremonies involved. He would regard the prājāpatya-vivāha as the only form of marriage both desirable and possible in the present age.

The Trawarmkācāras recognizes five phases in the marriage:

(i) the formal undertaking (vag-dana): the bride's father says: 'I will give my daughter'. The bridegroom's father replies: 'I accept';

&lt;sup>1</sup> MP xxxviii. 127-34 3 SrGuV 17a-18a.

<sup>2</sup> SDhA 111 23. 4 ADK, p 31b.

<sup>5</sup> TrA x1 41-64.

- (ii) the giving away (pradāna). the bride is given with her silken dress and ornaments after benediction by brahmins;
- (iii) the choosing (varana). the bridegroom's father tells the brahmins: 'Choose a girl for me', and they reply: 'we choose her':
- (iv) the hand-clasping (pāni-pidana): the bride takes the bridegroom's hands in hers;
- (v) the scattering of buds (ankurāropaņa).

The problem of monogamy or polygamy has, as noted in discussing the brahms-trata, more than once preoccupied the hardrya and theoretically at least any second marriage has been held to be a form of the bara-twabla-haraga attriar of this vow. Usagaiffer with locality but in general remarriage is admitted after varying intervals of time if a woman proves sterrile or gives birth only to still-born children or to female children'. The later Digambara writers recognize the custom of the dharma-patin and the bloga-patin, of which Rismanliar gives a very clear explanation.

Å wife, he says, is a woman wedded in the presence of one's kinsfolk after making pūjū to Jina, tāstra, and gurus, any other woman is only a concubine. The wife may be either a dhamapatm, a woman of one's own caste who collaborates in one's religious duties, or a hhoga-patm belonging to another caste who, apart from the fact that she is legally wedded, is indistinguishable from a concubine. It is only the former who can carry out the religious duties of the home and it is her son who will take his father's place when he retires from the world. The term bhoga-patm ofce not seem to be recorded before the Lāṭa-samhitā but the dhama-patmi figures already in Medhāvin's trāewākācāra. Soma-sena' would recognize the first wife as the dhama-patmi and the second as the bhoga-patm but following a local usage of the Kan-nada country would require a symbolic wedding to a plant (the arka-evivāhā) before any thrid marriage can be contracted.

18. VARNA-LĀBHA

In Jinasena's picture the young man who has completed the kriyā of marriage is still dependent on his father and still living in TrA x1. 197-8. 2 Lātī-samhitā, 11. 179-86.

<sup>3</sup> Dharma-samgraha-śrāvakācāra, ix. 207. + TrA xi. 200-5. For this custom see, inter alia, M. N. Srinivas, Marriage and Family in Mysore, p. 108
6 MP xxxviii. 135-41.

his house. The father now, after making the Jina-pūjā, transfers property to his son in the presence of leading laymen as witnesses, bidding him set up house on his own.

19. KULA-CARYĀ

This is nothing other than the family duty (kula-dharma) of a householder, it amounts to leading a blameless life, making pūjā to the Jina, and carrying out the six daily duties.

20. GRHĪŚITĀ

If a man carries out his duties as a householder and holds firmly to the dharma he may attain the status of a grhasthācārya which might perhaps be translated as 'elder', and seems to imply that he is the object of special respect and that his advice is listened to. Imasena' calls him a dvija-stattama (an excellent man of good caste), a grāma-yatt (one who within the village enjoys the esteem given to an ascetic), or a nistāraha (one who helps across the ocean of the samāra'a). This last term appears also in the Sagāra-thamāmīta;

21 PRAŚĀNTI

The layman will now have reached the summit of the lay life and it is time for him to think of withdrawing from the world. He is gradually to transfer the burdens of active life to his son and to seek tranquillity, attaching less and less value to material things and devoting himself to meditation and fasting.

22. GRHA-TYÄGA

This is the effective renunciation of worldly hie corresponding to the attainment of the eleventh pratimā and expressing itself in sahala-datt. According to Ašādhara' the layman is to summon a worthy son or other person from his gotra and in the presence of witnesses, who must be co-religionists belonging to his caste, say: 'My dear friend, up till now we have kept the household dispensation, but now we desire to abandon it, it is for you to take our post. A good son is ready to aid his father when he sets out to devote himself to the cultivation of his soul, any other son is but an enemy in the guise of a son. You must assume control of this property

&lt;sup>1</sup> MP xxxvm. 142-3.

<sup>3</sup> SDhA 1i. 56.

&lt;sup>3</sup> SDhA vii. 24-27.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. 144-7.

<sup>4</sup> MP xxxviii. 148-9.

and the religious duties and the dependants. Junasenal prescribes for the occasion a solemn pipa after which the layman in the presence of his loved ones entrusts everything he possesses to his son, saying: "This is our ancestral tradition which you must preserve. Our property is to be divided into three parts, one-third to be allocated for religious purposes, one-third for the upkeep of your household, and one-third for distribution among your brothers and sisters, who are to have equal shares. You, as the eldest, must be the protector of my children. Make pipa to gurus and Junas."

23. DIKSĀ

The reception into the monastic life closes the first phase of a man's existence on earth. It should follow a period spent in the eleventh bratimā.

Almost all the lay krivät that have been discussed are accompanied by a fina-pājā and by the recitation of appropriate mantras. Jinasena insists on their use and in fact the whole course of later Digambara Janusan is characterized by the importance given to the magic word. Jinasena also stresses that his descriptions represent only a brief summary of the most important features of each cermony for which varying details have been given by writers of old. The kriyās continue to hold an important place in the main current of the Müla Sańgha for at least several centuries, for Āsādhara in the Āṣāgāra-damāmaria makes a casual reference to them (ṣarbhā-dhāna, priit, supriit, '&c) implying that they are too well known to need description and, even much later, Medhāvin mentions them with the same familiarity. Yet in the end the Digambaras—like the Svetāmbaras, as we have seen—virtually borrow the samshāras of their Hindu neighbours.

Jinasena offers another, more general pattern for dividing all existence into seven stages to which he also applies the designation kriyā. Of these three apply to the human incarnation <sup>2</sup>

(i) Saj-jāti. This implies birth in a good family, covering purty of lineage on the father's side (kula) and on the mother's side (jāti). With this advantage of birth it is easy to obtain the ratina-traya—right belief, right knowledge, and right conduct—symbolized by the three threads of the yajīhapavita conferred on the boy in the upaniti ceremony. The remains of the pājā offering placed on him at the same time indicate his confirmation (sthiri-karana) in the faith. He is thereby given a new birth, not from a human womb, but from the womb of divine knowledge and is considered to be possessed of sai-iāti.

<sup>1</sup> MP xxxvnt 150-6

- (ii) Sad-grhitva. In this stage he keeps to the household life and follows a lact profession. The four Jana āśramas and the division into paksa (the disposition towards alumai), caryā (the undertaking not to commit himiā for the sake of propitating a deity or achieving a mantra, or in order to procure food or medicine) and sādhana (the purification of the soul by sallekhanā) are described.
  - (iii) Pārīvrājya. The life as a monk.

1 Cf SDhA 1. 19-20.

APPENDIX

ATICARAS OF THE AHIMSA-VRATA

(a) SIDDHASENA'S COMMENTARY ON THE TATTVĀRTHA-SŪTRA tatra bandhanam bandhah samyamanam rajju-dāmakādibhiḥ.

hananam vadhah-tādanam kasādıbhih, chavih—sarīram tvag vā tac-chedah pāṭanam dvidhā-karanam.

bharanam bhārah—pūranam atīva bādham susthu bhāro 'tibhāras tasyāropaṇam—skandha-pṛṣṭhādi-sthāpaṇam atibhārāropaṇam, aṇṇam aśaṇādi, pāṇam peyam udakādi tayor adāṇam nirodhah.

(b) PÜJYAPÄDA'S COMMENTARY ON THE TATTVÄRTHA-SÜTRA abhimata-desa-gati-nirodha-hetur bandhah.

daņda-kaša-vetrādibhir abhighātali prāninām vadhaḥ, na prāṇa-vyaparopanam, tatah prāg evāsya vinivṛttatvāt.

karna-nāsikādīnām avayavānām apanayanam chedah.

nyāyya-bhārād attrikta-vahanam atibhārāropaṇam. gav-ādīnām ksut-pipāsa-bādha-karanam anna-pāna-nirodhah.

(c) Haribhadra's commentary on the Āvasyaka bandhanam bandhaḥ—samyamanam rajju-dāmanakādibhih.

hananam vadhah—tādanam kasādıbhih.

chavih—śatīram tasya chedaḥ—pāṭanam karapattrādibhih. bharanam bhātah—atīva bharaṇam atibhārah prabhūtasya pūga-phalādeh skandha-prsthy—ādisv āropanam ity arthah. bhaktam asanam odanādi, pānam peyam udakādi tasya ca vyavacchedah-

(d) Abhayadeva's commentary on the Śrāvaka-dharma-bandhaḥ-rajju-dāmanakādıbhıḥ samyamanam.

vadhah—kaśādibhir hananam . . .

nirodho 'dānam.

chavih—tvak tad-yogāc charīram api chavis tasya cchedaḥ—asi-putrikādibhih pātanam chavicchedah.

bharanam bhārah—atīva bhāro 'tıbhārah—prabhūtasya pūga-phalāder gav-ādı-prsthādāv ārohanam.

bhakta-pānayor bhojanodakayor vyavacchedo nirodho bhakta-pānavyavacchedaḥ evam aviseṣena bandhādinām akaraniyatayopadese sati priyā-putrāder vinaya-grahaṇa-roga-cikitādy-arthānām api tesām vrata-mālinya-nimittatā prasayvate, tatas tat-parihārārtham āha 'krodhādı-dūsıta-manāh'-kopa-lobhādi-kasāva-kalankitāntahkaranah, prāni-prāna-prahāna-nirapeksa itv arthah . . . deśasya bhañianad deśasyaiya ca palanad aticara-vyapadeśah pravartate tad uktam.

'na maravāmīti-krta-vratasva . . .'

bandhādı-grahaņasya copalaksaņatvān mantra-tantra-prayogādayo 'nye 'ny evam atrăticăratavă drśvāh.

(e) ABHAYADEVA'S COMMENTARY ON THE UPASAKA-DASAH

bandho dvipadādīnām rauv-ādinā samvamanam.

vadho vastv-ādībhīs tādanam.

chavicchedah-sarīrāvavava-cchedah.

atibhäräropanam-tathävidha-śakti-vikalänäm mahä-bhäräropanam.

bhakta-pāna-yvavacchedah-asana-pānīvāpradānam. ıhayam vibhagah püjyair uktam.

'bandha-vaham chavi-chedam . . .' (verse 10 of Śrāvaka-dharmabañcāśaka auoted) tathā. 'na marayāmīti-kṛta-vratasya . . . '

(f) HEMACANDRA'S COMMENTARY ON THE YOGA-SASTRA

bandho 1211v-adına go-mahisy-adinam niyantranam, sva-putradinam apı vınava-grahanārtham krivate, atah 'krodhād' ity uktam, krodhāt prabala-kasävodayad yo bandhah sa prathamo 'tıcarah, chavih śarīram tvag vā tasyāh chedo dvaidhī-karaṇam, sa ca pādavalmīkopahata-pādasva putrāder api krivate . . .

adhikasva vodhum asakvasva bhārasvāropanam go-karabha-rāsabhamanusvädeh skandhe prethe sirasi vä vähanävädhiropanam . . .

prahāro lagudādina tādanam krodhād eva . . . annädi-rodho bhojana-pänäder nisedhah krodhäd eva . . .

(g) DEVENDRA'S COMMENTARY ON THE ŚRĀDDHA-DINA-KRTYA

bandho rajiv-ādibhih samyamanam. vadho dvipadādīnām nirdaya-tādanam. chavi-cchedah karnādi-karttanam. atibhāraḥ śakty-anapeksam guru-bhārāropaṇam, bhakta-päna-vyavacchedah-anna-päna-nirodhah.

(h) Aśādhara's commentary on the Sāgāra-dharmāmṛta bandho rajįv-ādinā go-manusyādīnām niyantraņam, sa ca putrādīnām api vinava-grahanärtham vidhīvate.

vadho danda-kaśādy-abhighātah.

chedah karna-nāsikādīnām avavavānām apanavanam.

atibhārādhıropaṇam nyāyya-bhārād atırıktasya vodhum asakyasya bhārasyāropaṇam vṛṣabhādīnām pṛṣṭha-skandhādau vāhanopādhıropaṇam. bhuktı-nırodho 'nna-pānādı-nısedhaḥ, tiksṇa-ksudhādi-pīditah prāṇī mriyata ity annadi-nirodho na kasyāpi kartavyaḥ.

ATICARAS OF THE SATYA-VRATA

(a) SIDDHASENA'S COMMENTARY ON THE TATTVÄRTHA-SÖTRA

nyasyate—nıksipyata iti nyāsah—rūpakādy-arpaṇam tasyāpahārah apalāpaḥ yoʻtra dravyāpahāraḥ parasva-svikarana-laksaṇaḥ sa na vivakṣitaḥ, tasyādattādāna-vaşavtvā, yat tatra vacanam apalāpakam yena kārana-bhūtena nyāso 'pahriyate apalapyate tad vacanam nyāsāpanaran...

rahah—ekāntas tatra bhavam rahasyam rahasyenābhyākhyānam abhiśamsanam asad-adhyāropanam rahasyābhyākhyānam...

rahasyena karmanā 'bhyākhyānam strī-pumsayoh paraspareņett pratārana-dvārens—yadī yrddībā strī tatas tasya kathayati 'ayum tach bhartā kumāryām att-prasaktah' atha taruqim tata evam āha 'ayam te bhartā praudha-cestitāyām madhyama-vayasi yostu prasaktas' tathā 'yam khara-kāmo mdu-kāma'ni tv ā parhasatı ...

ākāro 'nguli-hasta-bhrū-netra-kriyā-siraļi-kampādir aneka-rūpah paraśarīra-vartī, tena tīdīršā ākāreņa sahāvinā-bhūto yo mantro gūdhaḥ parābhiprāyas tam upalabhya sahākāram mantram asūyayāviṣkaroty esa sākāra-mantra-bhedah prakāšanam . . . .

etad uktam bhavatı—anadhikrta-sannıdhau cestä-visesaih sväküta-prakäsanam äkärah tam eva spastataram udäharatı—pasiunyam guhyamantra-bhedas ceti . . . mantranam mantro gupta-bhäsanam rājādikārya-sambandhas tasya bhedah prakhyāpanam . . .

kūtam asad-bhūtam likhyata iti lekhaḥ karanam kriyā kūta-lekha-kriyā anva-mudrāksara-bimba-svarūpa-lekha-karanam mithyopadeśah—asad-upadeśah parenānyasyātisandhānam svayam vā 'tisandhānam anyasya....

pramattasya vacanam para-pidā-jananam 'vāhyantām kharostrāḥ, hanyantām dasyava' iti.

(c) HARIBHADRA'S COMMENTARY ON THE ÄVASYAKA

sahasā—anālocya abhyākhyānam sahasābhyākhyānam abhæamsanam asad-adhyāropanam tad yathā 'cauras tvam paradāriko' vety-ādı, rahaḥ—ekāntas tatra bhavam rahasyam tena tasmin vā abhyākhyānam, etad uktam bhavati—ekānte mantrayamāṇān vakti—ete hīdam cedam ca rājāpakārītvādī mantrayantī.

- sva-dāre mantra-bhedaḥ sva-dāra-mantra-bhedaḥ—sva-dara-mantraprakāśanamsva-kalatra-viśrabdha-viśiṣṭāvasthā-mantritānya kathanam ity arthaḥ.
- küţam asad-bhūtam likhyata iti lekhaḥ tasya karaṇam kriyā kūṭa-lekhākriyā—kūṭa-lekha-karaṇam, anya-mudrāksara-bimba-svarūpa-lekhakaranam ity arthaḥ . . .
- nyasyate—niksipyata iti nyäsah—rūpyakādy-arpaṇaṃ tasyāpaharaṇam nyāsāpaharaḥ.
- (d) Abhayadeva's commentary on the Śrāvaka-dharmapańcāśaka
- sahasā analocyābhyākhyānam asad-dosādhyāropanam yathā 'cauras tvam pāradāriko' vety-ādi rahasā ckāntena hetunābhyākhyānam, etad uktam bhavati—rahası mantrayamānān abhidhatte—ete hidam cedam ca rāsa-viruddhādikam mantrayate.
- sva-dāra-mantra-bhedam—sva-kalatra-viśrabdha-bhāsitānya-kathanam, dāra-grahanam ceha mitrādy-upalaksanārtham...
- mrsa—alika-vadana-visaya upadeso yasya sa tatha tad bhavas tatta tam mrsopadesatam athava mrsopadesa eva mrsopadesakah, idam evam caiyani ca brühity-adikam asatyabhidhana-siksanam atas tam.
- kuṭa-lekhasya—aṣad-bhūtārtha-sūcakāksara-lekhanasya karaṇam—vidhāṇam kūta-lekha-karaṇam.

'sahas'-abbhakkhān'-āı jānanto jai karejja to bhaṅgo jai puna 'nābhog'-āihimto to hoi aiyāro'.

- (e) Abhayadeva's commentary on the Upasaka-daśah
- sahasā anliocyābhyākhyānam asad-doṣādhyāropaṇam sahasābhyākhyānam yathā'cauras tvam'int-ādi... raha ekāntas tena hetunābhyākhyānam raho 'bhyākhyānam, etad uktam bhavat rahası mantrayamānlnām, vaktı 'ete hidam cedam ca rājāpakārādi mantrayante'
- sva-dāra-sambandhino mantrasya viśrambha-jalpasya bhedaḥ prakāśanam sva-dāra-mantra-bhedaḥ . . . mṛsopadeśaḥ pareṣām asatyopadeśaḥ . . .
- kūṭa-lekha-karaṇam asad-bhūtārthasya lekhasya vidhānam.
- (f) Hemacandra's commentary on the Yoga-śästra
- sahasā anālocyābhyākhyānam asad-doṣādhyāropaṇam yathā 'cauras tvam pāradāriko' vety-ādi.
- anye tu sahasābhyākhyāna-sthāne rahasyābhyākhyānam paṭhanti, vyācaksate ca—raha ekāntas tatra bhavam rahasyam rahasyenābhyākhyānam abhsānssanam asad-adhyāropaṇam rahasyābhyākhyānam yathā—yadı vṛddha-strf tatas tasyai kathayati 'ayam tava bhartā tarunyām atiprasaktaḥ' atha tarunī tata evam āha 'ayam te bhartā prauḍha-ceṣṭitāyām madhyama-vayasi yoṣiti prasaktaḥ', tathā 'yam khara-kāmo mrdu-kāma' iti vā parihasati . . .

'sahas'-abbhakkhān'-āi . . . ' (verse as above quoted)

- guhyam gühanīyam na sarvasmai yat kathanīyam rājādi-kārya-sambaddham.
- tasyānadhikrtenaivākārengitādibhir jūātvānyasmai prakāšanam guhyabhāṣaṇam yathā 'ete hīdam idam ca rājā-viruddhādikam mantrayante, athavā guhya-bhāsaṇam paišunyam . . .
- vzivastā višvāsam upagatā ye mitra-kalatrādayas tesām mantro mantraņam tasya bhedaḥ prakāšanam, guhya-bhāsane guhyam ākārādinā vijnāyānadhikṛta eva guhyam iha tu svayam mantrayitvaiva mantram bhinattity anayor bhedah . . .
- muthyopadeśo 'sad-upadeśaḥ, pratipanna-satya-vratasya hi para-pīdākaram vacanam asatyam eva tataḥ pramādāt para-pīdā-karane upadeśe aticāro yathā 'vāhyantām kharosṭrādayo hanyantām dasyava' tti...
- kūṭam asad-bhūtam tasya lekho lekhanam kūṭa-lekhaḥ-anya-svarūpāksara-mudrā-karanam...

(g) Devendra's commentary on the Śrāddha-dinakrtya

- sahasā—anālocyābhyākhyānam asad-dosādhiropanam 'cauro 'yam' ityādy-abhidhānam sahasābhyākhyānam.
- rahası—ekānte mantrayamāṇān vīksya ıdam cedam rāja-viruddhādıkam ete mantrayante ıty-ādy-abhyākhyānan raho 'bhyākhyānam
- sva-dārāṇām visuddha-bhāṣitasyānyasmai kathanam sva-dāra-mantrabhedah.

ajñäta-mantrausadhädy-upadeśanam mysopadeśah.

anya-mudrāksara-bimbādinā kūtasyārthasya lekhanam kūta-lekhaḥ.

(h) ĀŚĀDHARA'S COMMENTARY ON THE SĀGĀRA-DHARMĀMRTA

- muhyādik—muhyopadešah, abhyudaya-nihšreyasārthesu kriyā-višeseys anyasyāynathā pravatnama parena sandehāpannena pratie jānāndinānyathā kathanam ity arthah, athavā pratipanna-satya-vratasya para-pidā-karam vacunam asatyam eva tatah pramādāt para-pidākarane upadeše atietro yathā 'vālyantām kharoqirādayo hanyamtān dasavax iti insparaojanam vacanam
- raho-'bhyākhyā rahasy ekānte strī-pumbhyām anusthitasya kriyāvisesasyābhyākhyā prakāšanam yayā dampatyor anyasya vā pumsah striyā vā rāga-prakarṣa utpadyate.

- mantra-bhedaḥ—aṅga-vikāra-bhrūkṣepādibhiḥ parābhiprāyam jñātvāsuyādinā tat-prakaṭanam visvasita-mitrādibhir vā ātmanā saha mantritasya lajjādi-karasyārthasya prakāsanam.
- kūṭa-lekhā-kriyā—anyenānuktam anuṣṭhitam ca yet kimcit tasya paraprayoga-vaṣād evam tenoktam anuṣṭhtam cetu vañcanā-nimittam lekhanam, anya-sarūpāksara-mudrā-karaṇam ity anye.
- nyāsāpahārah—nyastasya niksiptasya hiranyādi-dravyasya amsam ekam amsam vismartur vismarana-sīlasya nikseptur anujītā.

ATICĀRAS OF THE BHOGOPABHOGA-VRATA

- (a) SIDDHASENA'S COMMENTARY ON THE TATTVĀRTHA-SŪTRA cittam cetano samiñānam upayogo 'vadhānam íti paryāyāḥ...
- sacıtta âhāro vā yasya sacıttam ähārayatitı vā sacittāhārah, mūla-kandalīkandārdrakādı-sādhārana-vanaspatı-pratyeka-taru-sarīrāņi tad abhyavahārah, pṛthvy-ādi-kāyānām vā sacittānām . . .
- sacittena sambaddham karkatika-bīja-kaulikā-kulasya pakva-badarodumbarāmra-phalādi bhaksayatah sacitta-sambaddhāhāratvam . . .
- duspakvähärah—duspakvam manda-pakvam abhinna-tandula-phalalosta-yava-godhūma-sthūla-mandaka-kandulkādi tasyābhyavahāra aihika-prat;avāya-kārı yāvatā vāṃsena sacetanas tāvatā para-lokam anv unahantu.
- (c) HARIBHADRA'S COMMENTARY ON THE AVASYAKA
- sacıttam cetanā samıñānam upayogo 'padhānam iti paryāyāḥ.
- sacitto vā āhāro yasya sacittam āhārayati iti vā, mūla-kandalī-kandakārdrakādi-sādhāraņa-pratyeka-taru-śarīrāņi sacittāni sacittam pṛthvyādv āhārayatīti bhāvanā.
- sacıtta-pratibaddhāhāro yathā vṛkse pratibaddho gundādi pakvaphalāni vā.
- apakvauṣadha-bhaksaṇatvam ɪdam pratītam (sacitta-sammiśrāhāra iti vā pāṭhāntaraṃ sacittena sammiśra āhāraḥ sacitta-sammiśrāhāraḥ, vallv-ādı pusnādi vā sammiśram).
- duşpakvausadhi-bhakşanata duşpakvah—asvinnā ity arthah tad-bhaksanatā.
- tucchauşadhi-bhakşanată tucchă hi asără mudga-phali-prabhṛtayaḥ, atra hi mahatī virādhanā alpā ca tusṭih, bahvıbhır apy aihiko 'py apāyaḥ sambhāvyate.

- (d) Abhayadeva's commentary on the Śrāvaka-dharmapancāśaka
- sacittam sacetanam kandādi iha ca sarvatra nivṛtti-visayī-kṛta-pravṛttāv apy atucārābhidhānam vrata-sāpicksasyānābhogātikramādi-nibandhana-pravṛttyā drasṭavyam, anyathā bhanga eva syāt, atas tannivṛtti-visayī-kṛtam bhaksayatayā varjayatūti yogah.
- pratibaddham—sambaddham sacutta-vyksesu gundādi pakva-phalādi vā, tad-bhaksaṇam hi sāvadyāhāra-varjakasya sāvadyāhāra-pravṛttaripatvād anābhogādnāticārah, anyathāsthikam tyaksyām, tasyatva sacetanatvāt, kaṭāham tu bhaksaysyām tasyācetanatvāt, ti buddhyā pakvam kharjūrādi-phalam mukhe praksipatah sacutta-varjakasya sacutta-pratibaddhāhāro 'tucirah
- 'apaula'-apakvam agninā asamskṛtam
- 'dupaola'-duspakyam ardha-symnam.
- tuccham—nihsäram...
- ādyāv aticārau sacetana-kanda-phalādi-viṣayau itare tu śāly-osadhiviṣayah.
- (e) ABHAYADEVA'S COMMENTARY ON THE UPASAKA-DASAH
- sacıttâhāraḥ pṛthvy-ap-kāya-vanaspatı-jīva-śarīrānām sacetanānām abhyavaharanam...
  - sacitta-pratibaddhāhārah—sacitte vṛksādau pratibaddhasya gundāder abhyavaharanam.
  - athavā sacitie 'sthike pratibaddham yat pakvam acetanam kharjūraphalādi tasya 'sāsthikasya katāham acetanam bhakṣayisyāmītarat pariharisyāmi' iti bhāvanavā mukha-kṣepanam . . .
  - apakvausadhih—apakvāyā agnināsamskrtāyā osadheḥ śāly-ādi-kāyā bhaksanatā bhojanam . .
  - duspakvausadhih—duhpakva asvinnā osadhayas tad bhaksaṇatā, aticāratā cāsva pakva-buddhvā bhaksavatah . . . .
  - tucchausadhih—tuccha asārā oşadhayo 'nıspanna-mudga-phalī-prabhrtayah, tad-bhakşane hi mahatī virādhanā svalpā ca tat-kārya-trptih.
  - (f) HEMACANDRA'S COMMENTARY ON THE YOGA-ŚĀSTRA sacittah kanda-mūla-phalādih prthivī-kāyādir yā
- tha ca nvṛtti-vsayi-kṛta-pṛavīttau bhaṇga-sad-bhāve 'py attoārbhī-dhānam vrata-sāpeksasyānābhogātukramādinā pravṛttau drastavyam. tena sacritena sambaddhah pravibaddhaḥ sacetta-sambaddhah, sacettana-vṛksādinā sambaddho gundādih pakva-phalādir vi. sacritanatbiqia khaprūmarādhi, tad-shāro hi sacritikhāra-varpakasyānābhogadinā sāvadyhāra-pravṛtit-röpatvād attoāraḥ, athavā bijam ryaksyānt tasyavas sacetnantvāk akļalāmu to blakasyawyām tasyāvas cactnantvāk akļalāmu to blakasyawyām tasyāvas sacetnantvāk akṣālamu to blakasyawām tasyāvas sacetnantvāk akṣālamu

- iti buddhyā pakvam kharjūrādi-phalam mukhe praksipatah sacittavarjakasya sacitta-pratibaddhāhāraḥ.
- sacıttena mısrah sabalah, aharah sammısrahārah, yathā ārdrakadādıma-bīja-kulikā-cırbhaṭikādi-misrah pūraṇādih, tila-misro yavadhānādir vā . . .
- abhişavo 'neka-dravya-sandhāna-nişpannah surā-sauvīrakādih, mamsaprakāra-khaṇdādır vā surā-madhv-ādy-abhisyandi-vṛṣya-dravyopayogo vā...
- duşpakvo manda-pakvalı sa cāsāv āhāraś ca duspakvāhāraḥ, sa cārdhasvinna-pṛthuka-taṇdula-yava-godhūma-sthūla-mandaka-karkaṭakaphalādir ahika-pratyavāya-kāri yāvatā cāṃśena sacetanas tāvatā paralokam apy upahantı.
- kecit tv apakvähāram apy aticāratvena varņayanti, apakvam cāgninā yad asamskṛtam tucchausadhi-bhaksaṇam api kecid aticāram āhuḥ, tucchausadhayaś ca mudgādi-komala-śimbī-rūpāḥ...
- (g) Devendra's commentary on the Sräddha-dina-
- kṛta-sacitta-pratyākhyānasya krta-tat-parināmasya vā sacittam atiriktam anābhogādinā abhyavahāratah sacittāhāro 'ticārah.
- evam vṛksa-stha-gundādi rājādanādi vā sāsthikam phalam mukhe prakṣipatah sacitta-pratibadhāhārah.
- evanı apakvasya—agnına asamskrtasyaparınata-kanikkader bhakşayato bakvausadhı-bhaksanata.
- evam duspakvasya-- pṛthukāder duspakvauṣadhi-bhaksanatā
- tuccha—atrpti-hetutvād asāra osadhyāh komala-mudga-siñjādika bhaksayatās tucchausadhi-bhakṣanatā.
- (h) ĀŚĀDHARA'S COMMENTARY ON THE SĀGĀRA-DHARMĀ-MRTA
- tatra sacıttam cetanāvad dravyam harita-kāyam, apakvam karvaty-ādi, trasa-bahu-ghātety-ādinā nisiddhe 'py atra pravṛttau bhanga sadbhāve 'py atcārābhidhānam vrata-sāpeksasyāpranidhānātikramādinā pravṛttau drasjavyam.
- tena sambaddham sacutenopaslistam sacetana-vṛksadinā sambaddham gondādikam pakva-phalādkam sacutinatohjam khativārmīdikam, tad-āhāro hi sacittāhāra-varjakssyānābhogādinā sāvadyāhāra-pravṛtti-rūpatvād atteārah, athavā bijam tyaksyāmi tasyava sacetanavāt kajāham tu bibaksyaysyāmi tasyacetanavād att buddhyā pakvam khatjūrādi-phalam mukhe praksipatah sacuta-varjakasya sacuta-pratibāddhāhārah.
- sammısram tena sacittena vyatikirnam vıbhaktam asakyam süksmajantukam ity arthah athava sacitta-sabalam tat-sammisram yatha

- ardraka-dāḍima-bīja-cırbhaṭıkādı-miśram pūranādıkam, tila-miśram yava-dhanādıkam.
- duşpakvam santas tandula-bhāvena atikledanena vā duṣṭam pakvam manda-pakvam vā duṣpakvam tac cārddha-svnnnam pṛthuka-tandulayava-godhūma-sthūla-mandaka-phalādikamāma-dosāvahatvenaihikapratyavāya-kāranam.
- abhişavam sauvīrādi-dravam vā vṛsyam vā.

वीर सेवा मन्दिर